In the meane time the Tartars greedie of prey, and ſtill ſeeking after bootie, ranſackt and ſpoyled fiue and twentie countrie villages about VERADIN; all which they afterward burned alſo, carrying away with them a great bootie both of men and cattell, no man reſiſting them. At which time other companies of them alſo inuading the Countie Serin his iſland as farre as RACKENSPVRGE, made in it great ſpoyle, as had their fellowes elſewhere, and beſide other bootie, carryed away with them two thouſand Chriſtian captiues. Theſe outrages of the Tartars armed the Countie on the one ſide, and Collonitz on the other: who couragiouſly oppoſing themſelues againſt theſe Barbarians, for a time ſtayed their incurſions, they not daring to abide the force of this little armie, ſufficient ynough by the valour thereof to haue ouerthrowne that of their enemies, for number dreadfull. This made them to turne their courſe another way into SCLAVONIA, being in number fiue and thirtie thouſand men, leauing nothing behind them there but death and deſolation, for the number of priſoners and great booties, which they carryed from thence. Amongſt other their ſpoyles, it was their fortune by the way to meet with ſixe hundred of the Chriſtian ſouldiors, of whom not one eſcaped their hands, but were ſlaine euerie mothers ſonne. At length it fortuned, that certaine of their troupes in roaming abroad, fell into the danger of Countie Serin, who with his followers ſtill houered a loofe off, for feare to bee of their great multitude ouerwhelmed: a part whereof now falling into his hands, were by his ſouldiours ouerthrowne and all cut in pieces, and a number of Chriſtian captiues by them taken, deliuered out of chaines, and ſet at libertie. Which exploit was greater for the feare it brought vpon the enemie, than for the ſlaughter there made. For the Tartars ſtill in doubt, to meete againe with the Chriſtian troupes (who left not one of them aliue that they could light vpon) were glad now to keep themſelues cloſer togither, and ſo did a great deale the leſſe harme than when they without feare roamed vp and downe at their pleaſure: ſo that euen by this little victorie the countrie receiued ſome comfort, and the earle greater honour. Small helpes being infinit treaſures in time of neceſſitie, which out of it would not bee to bee reckoned of. H I K

The Tartars repreſſed by countie Serin.

The garriſon ſouldiors of CANISIA of late defeated by Collonitz in going to meet the conuoy comming towards them with victuals (as is before declared) the reſt of the garriſon deſirous to be reuenged, were coſulting of the meanes, how to bring the ſame to paſſe. It fortuned, that at the ſame time there was a fugitiue Chriſtian ſouldiour in the towne, who made ſhew of a man malecontent, deſirous to turne Turke: of whom the Turkes made much reckoning, for that he ſeemed to know much of the deſignes of the Chriſtians, and the meanes how to croſſe them: Whereof hee ſo aſſured them, as if the matter had beene now alreadie done; promiſing to bring them euen into the middeſt of the Chriſtian campe, and to deliuer it into their hands and power. Howbeit his meaning was nothing leſſe: for ſeeing the Turkes much buſied with carrying in of victualls into the caſtle, brought into the towne after the ouerthrow of their fellowes before ſent foorth for the bringing in thereof, and wholly intentiue to that buſineſſe; knowing the place in the caſtle where the powder and munition lay, he at the ſame time by a traine layed fire thereunto, and afterward amiddeſt the tumult and the ſturre, by a loope in the wall, got himſelfe out of the towne, and came to Collonitz, who with his troupes lay neere there by in ambuſh, expecting the opportunitie to performe ſome notable exploit, vpon the ſucceſſe of ſo daungerous an aduenture, whereunto hee had before beene made priuie. Neither fayled the fire any thing of the accuſtomed violence thereof, but ſeemed rather to redouble the ſame, it had ſo ſuddenly conſumed the buildings, munitions, & perſons. All the place felt the furie thereof, the cannons, cannoniers, ſouldiours, and whatſoeuer elſe, was ſubiect L M

A vnto this dreadfull blaſt: all was ſhaken and turned vpſide down, yea the fire burſt out of the caſtle, and burnt the greateſt part of the towne alſo. There was a confuſion of feare, miſhap, and miſerie together, the terror whereof cauſed many of the Turkes to caſt themſelues ouer the wals, in hope ſo to haue ſaued their liues. But whileſt they thought ſo to haue eſcaped the danger of the fire, they preſently fell vpon the edge of the ſword: for meting with the ſouldiours of Collonitz, who lying in ambuſh neere there by, awaited the opportunitie in that ſo confuſed a tumult to haue ſeiſed vpon the place, they were all either taken priſoners, or ſlaine. But ſee the happe, how one croſſe chance of fortune ouerthrewe this ſo notable a deſigne, as had it beene well followed, might in one moment haue recouered that ſtrong
B place which had before for the ſpace of many dayes endured the greateſt forces of the Othoman Emperours; neither yet was then ſo loſt, but through the infamous trecherie of our owne men.

Aſſine opportunitie for the reconery of Canisia ouerſlipped through the diſloyaltie of the French and Wallons.

You haue heard before how that Collonitz had by faire perſuaſions, rather than by true effects, appeaſed the French men and Wallons vp in mutinie for their pay; ſo that by him perſuaded, they had againe giuen their oath of fidelitie vnto the Emperour, and to follow his armie. But now when occaſion ſerued, and held out as it were both her armes vnto the Chriſtians, for the regaining and conqueſt of CANISIA, theſe Frenchmen and Wallons, the greateſt part of Collonitz his ſtrength, iniuriouſly refuſed her ſo faire an offer, and, at ſuch
C time as they ſhould rather haue fought naked, than haue failed in their duetie (it being to haue gained a moſt great and rich conqueſt) for want of pay (as they pretended) turned their backes, and being by no intreatie or perſuaſions to bee mooued, to the diſcouragement of the reſt, who were better minded, and their owne eternall infamie, withdrew themſelues from the armie: So that Collonitz rather by the wicked vnfaithfulneſſe of his owne diſloyall ſouldiors, than by the valour of his enemies, diſappointed of his purpoſe, was to his great diſcontentment, contrarie to that he hoped, enforced to retire, without any thing more doing.

While this exploit ſo well begun, but euill performed, was in hand, the Turkes and Tartars aſſembled togither, made a cruell ſpoile in the countrie about RAB, euen almoſt vnto the gates of the towne, carrying away with them a great number both of men and beaſts.
D In fine, it chanced that the Huſſars of the Lord Nadaſti came that way, who vnderſtanding what hae happened, with all ſpeed made after theſe robbers, ouertooke them in their retreat neere vnto ALBA REGALIS, ſlew a great number of them, and enforced the reſt to leaue a great part of their prey behind them. With which bootie recouered euen out of the Lyons mouth, they returned to RAB, of whom the poore inhabitants and countrie people, with teares ſtanding in their eyes, requeſted to heue againe their owne goods. But warre the enemie of charitie, and nurſe of barbarous crueltie, had ſo hardened the hearts of theſe men of warre, as that they were not to bee mooued to reſtore them their cattell againe, but that they muſt redeeme them for preſent money, which they did, and ſo receiued them.

2000 Turks defeated by Collonitz

E Now the noble Collonitz ſeeing himſelfe ſo ſhamefully forſaken of his owne ſouldiours, and diſappointed of his purpoſe; and the Turks and Tartars in great numbers comming to the reliefe and repairing of this ſo ſore ſhaken towne; and out of hope to do any good thereon, full of griefe and indignation returned towards COMORA. And howbeit that euill hap had cruelly fruſtrated the glorie of his enterpriſe, yet the heauens in deſpight of fortunes frown, left not this noble and valiant captaine altogither without honour, but as amorous of his vertues and valour, preſented vnto him in this Winter of fortunes diſpleaſure, ſome trophies of glory. For vpon the way as he was returning home, he met with two thouſand Turks, F whom after ſome ſmall reſiſtance he cut all in pieces: meſerable ſacrifices appointed vnto the furie of his wrath. In this fight their enſignes were all taken, and a number of priſoners, the chiefe of whom togither with the enſignes, he ſent to PRAGE, as a preſent for the emperor, and a token of his good ſeruice.

The report then was, That the Turkes and Tartars with their vnited forces had forraged SCLAVONIA, taken diuers ſtrong holds, burnt a number of villages, and carryed away eight thouſand Chriſtians priſoners, beſide a great number moe ſlaine with the ſword, or conſumed with fire; and all the cattell of the countrie driuen away: and that being with this booG tie come to QVINQVE ECCLESIÆ, they had there receiued commaund with Mahomet Bessa to besiege COMORA, and that all the commaunders of the Turks armie were thereupon resolued. All which reports no whit dismaied the valiant Collonitz, or any thing altred his designes, but hauing fortified COMARA against the intended siege of the Turkes, and taken from thence foure culuerins, according to a former purpose by himselfe intended, resolued now to take from the Turks the castles of LOQVA and BOVLONNEVAR, the garrisons wherof greately annoyed the territories of the Christians, and hindred the designes of this great captaine. These two castles are situat vpon a great marish which seperateth HVNGARIE from RASCIA, and are therefore as bounders of HVNGARIE, and strong ynough to be defended against a small armie. H

The castle of Loqua besieged by Collonitz.

Vpon which resolution he set forward with his small and valiant power, & the fourth day arriued within the sight of LOQVA, a castle well manned, and furnished with all things necessarie for the defence therof. The armie lodged, Collonitz by a drum summoned the besieged to yeeld vp the place, with promises of courtesie if they should now accept of the same whilest it was offered them: Which they stoutly refused to do, swearing to the contrarie, That they would die and liue within those their walls. Collonitz seeing them so resolued, first caused a mill to be assaulted, which placed ouer against the castle, and well fortified, serued it in stead of a bulwarke, and seemed hard to be taken: howbeit his men, loath to haue their good fortune euen in the beginning checked, gaue thereunto so braue an assault, that after the enemie had done what he could for the defence thereof, they became masters of the place, carried I it, and therein lodged. But finding it daungerous to bee kept, and to stand them in small stead, they set it on fire, and afterward planted foure culuerins in batterie before the castle. But as they were thus busied, the Turks couragiously sallyed out vpon them, not doubting to aduenture themselues, for the hope they had to bee in short time by their great armie relieued. In this sallie they met afront with the Haiduckes, whom they fiercely charged, and so gauled them, that hauing slaine thirtie of them, they retired without any losse, forthwith discharging so many thundering shot and arrowes vpon our men, as that they well knew not how to saue themselues from the daunger of them, in such sort, that all the waies to approch the place being stopped, they began to deuise how to set the castle on fire: which they by certaine fire workes attempted, but to small purpose; the fire being no sooner kindled, but that K it was forthwith by the Turks quenched. This done, and our men disappointed of their hope, they deuised to set fire vpon the timber which ioined the palisadoe to the castle stretching toward the port. Which their attempt sorted but to small effect also, the fire burning but slowly to do the enemies any great harme. All which deuises failing, they resolued by plaine force to assault the castle, and to scale the same. Which enterprise resolued vpon, the Haiduckes carrying before them certaine strong and thicke plankes of wood, in stead of targuets, to defend themselues from the small shot and arrowes of their enemies, by this deuise gained the palisadoe placed vpon the ditch: and being there in some safetie, with their muskets and harquebusies so applied the besieged, that they draue them from their curtaines, and made that they durst no more shew themselues vpon the wals. And immediatly L after two companies of the Haiduckes placed ten ladders against one of the towers of the castle: and so with their ensignes in their hands, couragiously mounted the ladders, in hope to haue gained the place. But the Turkes as men resolued to die and liue in their castle, valiantly repulsed those Haiduckes, and by force drew in vnto them from off the ladders the two ensigne-bearers of the Haiduckes; whose heads they cut off, and cast them downe vnto their fellowes which were yet comming vp the ladders: and the two ensignes so gained vpon the wals, they placed in the middest of their owne, as the trophies of the spoiles of them who would haue spoiled them. With which so great courage of the enemies, and death of their fellowes, our men not a little dismaied, kept themselues close at the foot of the wall, as M afraid any farther to force the place, which to their losse they saw stored with such valiant men to defend it.

Notable resistance made by the besieged Turkes.

Collonitz perceiuing this discomfiture of these men, and wel assured that the castle was not but by valour to be woon, immediatly drew out of euery companie of the Countie Ringraue, cer-

A cermine of the beſt and moſt reſolute ſouldiors, to renew the aſſault: Which ſo honourable a charge they cheerfelly vndertooke, and as men of courage began foorthwith to mount the ladders. Which the Haiduckes beholding, againe tooke courage, and partly aſhamed of themſelues, and partly to be partakers of the ſpoile and prey, if they ſhould preuaile, did what they might for the winning the place, ſtriuing now who ſhould do beſt. Which aſſault was with ſuch furie and preaſe of men maintained, that the Turkes not able longer to withſtand ſo great forces, were conſtrained to yeeld both themſelues and their caſtle vnto the furie of their angrie enemies. Which caſtle indeed coſt much Chriſtian blood, but yet more of the Turkes: For the Haiduckes armed with rage and reuenge, ſlew almoſt all in the caſtle, as well Raſcians as Turks, and tooke the reſt priſoners. Among others there was an Hungarian renegate there taken, whom for haſt they beheaded, being not at leaſure to empaile him, B the ordinarie puniſhment for ſuch faithleſſe miſcreants. But during this ſpoile made by men chafed with furie, the wind and fire were on their part exerciſing of their rage alſo. For the fire which they had caſt vpon the paliſadoe, and which they had before neglected, as of little or no force, now encreaſed with the wind, by little and little getting hold of one thing after another, hauing burnt the paliſadoe, got hold of the caſtle alſo. Whereunto the ſouldiours loaded with prey and bootie (the things they moſt deſired) had no regard at all: ſo that the fire vtterly conſumed the caſtle, with whatſoeuer elſe had eſcaped their greedie hands.

The caſtle of Lequa by the Chriſtians taken and ſacked.

The Turks in garriſon at Bovlovvenar, a fortreſſe but a league diſtant from this burnt C caſtle, ſeeing theſe flames of fire, and doubting what might betide themſelues, began to conſult what courſe were beſt for them to take, as either to attend the comming of the enemie, and ſo to abide the chance of war, or elſe betimes to prouide for themſelues by flight: the conſideration of their honour and duetie perſuaded them to ſtay, but the ruine of their neighbours, as ſtrong and valiant as themſelues, perſuaded them otherwiſe. In fine, the care for the preſeruation of their liues preuailed, and the reſolution was, That they ſhould flie. And ſo putting all their houſhold-ſtuffe and goods into certaine boats there readie vpon the lake, they by the middeſt thereof fled: fooliſhly perſuading themſelues, that our men comming thither, and finding nothing there, would not long there ſtay, but bee gone; after whoſe departure they might as they thought returne againe vnto their old dwellings, and in D the meane time hid themſelues in the mariſh vntill that the enemie were paſt. But our men comming thither, and finding no man in the caſtle, neither yet any thing elſe that could well be carried away, wondered to ſee that there were any men ſo cowardly, as for feare to abandon ſuch a place, as for the ſtrength thereof might haue been an example to others, to ſtand vpon their guard and defence: and ſought out euery corner thereabout, to find out whither theſe Turks were fled. At laſt after much diligent ſearch, they found certaine boats, which the Turks had ſunke in the channell neere vnto the caſtle gate, which cauſed them to thinke that they were fled by water, and happily were in ſome place not farre off. Theſe boats were forthwith drawne vp out of the water, and found furniſhed with oares, and ſuch other things as belonged vnto them. Which done, Collonitz choſe out certaine of the moſt valiant and re-E ſolute of the Haiducks, whom he commanded in thoſe boats to follow after the Turks in the lake. Who accuſtomed to ſuch exploits, and not ignorant of the places and ſecrets of their countrie, went aboord, and did as they were commanded. Neither had they gone paſt two leagues vpon the lake, but that they diſcouered a partie of theſe fugitiues hid in a little iſland, awaiting the end of this tempeſt, to recouer againe that which they had forſaken. The Turks diſmaied with the ſight of theſe men, & forced by neceſſitie to ſtand vpon their guard, welcomed them with certaine little faulcon ſhot, which they had brought with them in their boats, thinking ſo haue hindered them from landing. But they were too well acquainted with ſuch muſick, to be moued therwith: beſides that, the deſire of the bootie which was by the Turkes brought out of the caſtle into the iſle, exceedingly animated them for the gaining F therof: ſo that all fear of danger ſet apart they landed in the iſle. Whom ſo landing, the Turks with great courage receiued, ſo that betwixt them was fought a greater fight than is for ſo ſmal a number on both ſides to be beleiued, only valour & not number holding the balance of the victorie. But in the end the chiefe of the Turkes, and he which was their Gouernour in Bovlovvenar, ſlaine, the reſt diſcouraged, came to parley, yeelding themſelues with their their wiues and children, and all that they had, as a prey vnto the victors. The prisoners were brought backe againe vnto the castle, vntill the next day, that our men hauing put a good and strong garrison of foure hundred Haiduckes, and two hundred Hussars into BOVLOVVENAR, with their prisoners and their bootie returned toward COMORA: where they, notwithstanding diuers reports of the assembly of the Turks garrisons for the surprising of them vpon the way, in safetie arriued, with a rich bootie, and a number of wagons loaded with the spoiles of their enemies. The emperour had for his part thirteene ensignes, beside the places woon; which being nigh vnto CANISIA, much bridled the spoilings and incursions of that garrison. G

But leauing these endlesse troubles of HVNGARIE for a while, let vs now againe looke into TRANSYLVANIA, to see what they there do. Moyses the rebell by Basta the emperours lieutenant (as we haue before said) ouerthrowne, and disappointed of his hope, betooke himselfe vnto a strong castle of his owne, called SOLOMOSE, there in feare attending the finall successe of his affaires. Basta in the meane time being as wise to make vse of his victorie, as he was valiant to obtain the same, subdued the rest of the countrie, repressed the rebels, stopped the way of sedition, and put Moyses in despaire of all safetie. Who seeing himselfe brought vnto such extremitie, offered to yeeld his castle vnto the Turks, and so without farther acquainting of any man with his purpose, thrust himselfe with his wife and familie, and all the rest of his substance into TEMESVVAR, a strong citie of the Turks not far off. Whom the Bassa in shew most courteously receiued, and the rather, for that he was in good hope to make a prey of the great wealth of this new come fugitiue. Who had not there long stayed, but that he had persuaded the captaine of GIVASGAR, a strong frontier castle there by, to deliuer the same vnto the Turks, and that without the priuitie of the garrison souldiours, for that he doubted that they would hardly be therunto drawn: who yet getting knowledge thereof, put their captaine in remembrance of his dutie, beseeching him not to draw such an infamie both vpon himselfe & them, by committing of so foule a fact. But afterward finding him resolutely set downe for the betraying of the castle, they suddenly laied hands vpon him, & struck off his head; and so with the bloud of their traiterous captain, hauing auerted the imminent danger, with great honour held the place. H I

He with his wife and familie flyeth vnto the Turkes.

Moyses now as he thought in safetie at TEMESVVAR, was yet still plotting how to trouble the state of TRANSYLVANIA, and to raise new stirs therein, and to that end sent a number of spies with letters of credence vnto the principall men of that countrie, assuring them of great and sufficient aid from the great Turke, if they would but take vp armes for their libertie (as he tearmed it) and shew themselues in field against the Imperials. Neither was Basta in the meane time careless of him, or negligent in his so waightie affaires; but knowing that he as a notorious rebell had yeelded his castle vnto the Turkes, and was himselfe retired vnto TEMESVVAR, forthwith made choice of six thousand of the best souldiours in his whole armie, and so set forward to besiege it: whom at his arriuall the Turkes there in garrison derided, in hope to frustrat his designes. For why, they thought that the castle seated vpon a steepe high hill, fortified with good and strong wals, enuironed with a broad and deep ditch, and not subiect vnto batterie, could not but with much labour, great daunger, and long time be gained out of their hands, it being impossible (as they supposed) for their enemies to make a breach or find an entrance thereinto. And indeed our men seeing the strength of the place, and the difficultie to force it, stood at the first as men dismaied at the foot of the hil where the castle stood; yet more discouraged with the impregnablenes of the place, than with the valor of the defendants. But what cannot industrie and valour do? in seeking about to find some means to make shew of their corage & valour, they discouered a little sharp steepe hill, ouer against the castle, from the top whereof the castle was to be battered, and the besieged distressed: But to bring the cannon thither, and especially with horses, was impossible, by reason of the steep roughnesse of the ascent thereunto, with broken and hanging rockes, ouergrowne with trees and bushes, as if it had been another Alpes, not but with fire and vinegre to be opened: yet in fine, our men resolued to gaine the place, did themselues that which their horses should haue done, but could not, & by force of hand drew their cannon vp to the top of the hill; and hauing planted it ouer against the midst of their enemies great ordnance, began to batter the castle: which done, they day & night made their approches, fortified their forts & K L M

But the Turkes more admiring the valorous reſolution of our men, then reſolued themſelues vpon their reſiſtance, being not many in number within the place, and ſeeing themſelues to haue to do with men of inuincible courage, laying aſide both their hope and weapons, craued to come to a parley. Which graunted, it was at length agreed, That they ſhould deliuer vp the caſtle, leauing behind them their great ordnance, their munition, and enſignes, and ſo with their armes and lines only ſaued to depart. A great and glorious conqueſt got with ſmall charge; onely by reſolution gained by our men without perill: thoſe being indeed the true victories, which neither draw bloud out of the veines, nor teares out of the eyes.

B This ſtrong place ſo gained, contrary to the common opinion conceiued thereof, led the whole prouince as it were by the hand vnto the obeiſance of the emperour: in ſuch ſort, that Baſta hauing called together all the principall men of TRANSYLVANIA, declared vnto them the iuſtice of his cauſe, the right of the Emperour, with the malice and trechery of the Turkes and rebels: How they might liue in aſſurance with the one, and become miſerable with the others: That the Emperour was alwaies armed for their defence and health, deſiring nothing but their welfare and preſeruation; whereas their enemies to the contrarie ſought altogether their ruine and decay: That as they were not to expect light flames of fire out of the ſea, no more they were to looke for aid from thoſe their mortall enemies, whom they knew to haue before decreed to haue put them all to death, and to haue giuen their countrey vnto the Tar-

This their offer was by Baſta accepted, and the minds of theſe people by this contentment giuen them, kept in their dutifull allegeance and loyaltie vnto the Emperour.

But whileſt Baſta thus trauelled for the quieting of TRANSYLVANIA, Moyſes the rebell in the meane time was for his part no leſſe buſied for the diſturbing thereof againe; inſomuch, that hauing by the appointment of the Viſier Baſſa receiued tenne thouſand Tartars in his aid, and aſſiſted with a great number of Turks, he with enſignes diſplaied entred into TRANSYLVANIA, proteſting there to die, or to be reuenged of Baſta, who had before chaſed him out thence. which he came to take of the Transyluanians, for their allegeance vnto the Emperor, which assured him from all stirres and tumults in that prouince, being with a smal power come from CLAVDIOPOLIS in HVNGARIE, and then lying at WISCEBOVRG, vpon the confines of HVNGARIE. Which his iourney, and the necessitie of his presence in HVNGARIE for the defence thereof, had caused the Transyluanians to beleeue, that he should for that yeare stay in HVNGARIE as Generall of the Emperours armie there. Vpon which persuasion of his absence many of them began againe to hold vp their heads, and to entertaine high conceits of new stirs, whereunto Moyses by his espials had prepared them, and now by his presence not a little encouraged: insomuch, that many as well of the nobilitie as others ioyned themselues vnto him, and increased his armie against the Imperials. G

Moyses with this power being come into the prouince, first forced a castle, about three leagues distant from WISCEBOVRG, and slew all the garrison therein. Which exploit encouraged him farther, full of hope in the absence of Basta; and seeing himselfe now the absolute master of the field, which he at his pleasure without resistance forraged, robbed, and spoyled, with his men loaded with bootie, besieged WISCEBOVRG, a little towne vpon the confines of HVNGARIE and TRANSYLVANIA, neither by art nor by nature strong, but exposed as a prey vnto him that is in the field strongest, if succours be not at hand to relieue it. Howbeit, weake as it was, it held out three weekes siege, and hauing a breach made in the walles, endured two assaults against all the forces of the rebell. After which the besieged thinking themselues to haue sufficiently discharged their duetie, in holding out so long, and enduring of so much, and out of hope to be relieued by the weake forces of Basta, came to parley with the enemie, and their liues and goods saued, yeelded vnto him the towne, and so departed themselues to VARADIN. Wiscebourg yielded to Moyses.

Now, albeit that there were no great forces of the Emperours on foot in TRANSYLVANIA, yet the hungrie Haiduckes for all that fayled not to follow these warres, euen amidst the great clouds of their enemies, and were euer taking of some prey or bootie from the enemie, the chiefest and almost the onely meanes whereby they liue. In which doing, as they benefited themselues (the chiefe motiues of their aduentures) so they not a little eased the countrey, by repressing the excursions and pillages of the Turkes, whereof the countrey had endured the furie. Where, amongst other prisoners by them taken, it was their fortune to light vpon a Chiaus of the Turkes come from CONSTANTINOPLE, going toward the rebell Moyses from the Great Sultan Mahomet. Who by them examined, confessed, That Moyses was a man in great grace and reputation with his Lord and Master the Graund Seignior: And that hee was sent to assure him thereof; as also of all the needfull assistance of his Prince, if hee should faithfully and effectually serue him in TRANSILVANIA, and bring it vnder his subiection and power, as hee had promised and sworne. In which doing, he should not onely gaine the credit of a noble and faithfull seruant towards him, but should farther obtaine thereby the honour to bee the Lieutenant Generall of his armie in this Prouince; the Great Sultan (as hee said) hauing meanes as easie as wordes to aduaunce his faithfull seruitours, who might draw moe good fortunes in one houre out of this infinite source of felicitie and greatnesse, than they could in a thousand yeares out of the pouertie of the Princes of EVROPE. Hee sayd also, That the Great Sultan had on foot an armie of an hundred and fiftie thousand men strong, for the conquest of PESTH, and STRIGONIVM, furnished with all things necessarie, which had now alreadie turned head toward HVNGARIE, had it not been for the rebellion of some of his disloyall subiects, whom for all that hee would in short time chastise, and so turne his whole forces vpon the Emperour. Moyses in great fauour with Mahomet.

Moyses prowd of his late conquest, and hauing found a great deale of great ordnance in WISCEBOVRG, resolued to prosecute his victorie, and to besiege Basta in SOMOSINNAR, whereinto hee had thrust himselfe, with the rest of his small forces. But Basta better acquainted with martiall affaires than hee, and knowing that a Generall departed from his charge, and brought to the mercie of a wall for his chiefe defence, hath lost his credit and reputation, with his friends, and they also all hope of safetie from him; thought it best first to take order for the strengthening of the place, so to put Moyses out of hope of the winning thereof, and afterward as he might to prouide for the safetie of himselfe and his. M

A Generall besieged looseth his reputation.

Where-

A Wherefore hee in good time aduertiſed the Gouernour of CASSOVA (who was neereſt vnto him) of Moyſes his deſignes, and of the neceſſitie wherewith he was himſelfe encloſed. Who forthwith conceiuing the conſequence of ſo great an exploit, as concerned both the loſſe of the place, and of ſo great a commander as was Baſta, a loſſe irreparable; preſently commanded ſix companies of horſemen to thruſt themſelues into the place, for the better defence thereof. Theſe horſemen either afraid of the rebels armie, or elſe fauouring his proceedings, without reſpect of that they had in charge, or of their honour (things deerer vnto men of worth than their liues) without any attempt at all giuen returned againe to CASSOVA; hauing with their pilfering and outrages by the way much offended and prouoked the minds of the countrey people by them ſpoiled. But being now better aduiſed, and repenting themſelues
B of their faults, and crauing pardon of their Gouernour, who was about with the reſt of his power to haue cut them in pieces, they offered him for ſatisfaction, ſix of the principall authors of their diſloyaltie; who were all forthwith executed, and their quarters (to the terrour of others) hanged vp vpon gibbets by the high waies ſide. But Baſta by their trechery lay in the meane time without ſuccour, forſaken by his friends, and the place wherein he lay in danger to be taken: when the Tranſyluanians dwelling neere thereby reſolued to relieue him as well for feare of the Turks bondage, as for the tyrrannie of Moyſes; one of whoſe Secretaries with letters of credence then threatened all the countrey with fire and ſword, and all kind of miſeries, if the inhabitants helped not with all their power to force the place, and to winne it. Which threats by Moiſes publiſhed before he had any abſolute power, diſmaied euery man:
C for why, they could not hope for any moderation or kindneſſe in the proſperitie of him, who in the time of his aduerſitie gaue ſuch apparent teſtimonies of his crueltie. So that the people doubting this angrie man, reſolued to preuent his ſo grieuous threats by relieuing of Baſta, who onely was able to ſtop him. Amongſt others, Radul Vayuod of VALACHIA mindful of the aid that Baſta had giuen him againſt the Tartars, and willing now as a friend to reach his hand in time of his ſo hard diſtreſſe, immediatly raiſed a power of eight thouſand Valachians, which he preſently ſent to the reliefe of Baſta. Moyſes aduertiſed of their comming, and farther vnderſtanding, that Baſta hauing wel fortified the place, was departed thence, hauing before his departure aſſuredly promiſed his men there left to relieue them, and that hee was now in the middeſt of the field gathering together his army, changed both his reſolution
D and purpoſe, of himſelfe raiſed his ſiege, and ſo departed. After which, miſhaps began to fall vpon him by heapes. The Turks forthwith forſooke him, taking their way to TEMESVVAR, whither they were by the Baſſa called backe, to repreſſe the Haiduckes, who were now euerie day euen at the gates of the citie. Theſe actiue and couragious men for their profit attending vpon all occaſions, knowing that the better part of the garriſon of TEMESVVAR was gone to aid Moyſes, vpon the ſudden had deſperatly aſſailed the ſuburbs of that ſtrong citie, ſlaine all that they found there, rifled them, and burnt them: and ſo loaded with a great and rich prey both of cattell and other things, returned to VERADIN, no man purſuing of them. And not ſo contented, were euery day abroad ſeeking after new bootie. Which was the cauſe that the Baſſa now called backe the Turks from Moyſes home againe into their garriſons.

E Moyſes notwithſtanding this departure of the garriſon Turks of TEMESVVAR, was yet maſter of the field, Baſta with his ſmall forces not daring to oppoſe himſelfe againſt him, yet by farre too ſtrong for him, the ſuccours from the Vayuod of VALACHIA being not yet come, which hee daily expected, howbeit that many hote skirmiſhes paſſed betwixt the ſtragling ſouldiors on both ſides, as they by chance met together roaming abroad in the countrey ſeeking after bootie. Moyſes therefore ſeeing not any ſufficient enemie to appeare in field able to ſtay him, laid ſiege to CLAVDINOPLE, a great but weake citie, and not very well manned; for that it was thought a place fitter by the weakneſſe thereof to weaken and deſtroy ſuch as ſhould vndertake the defence thereof, then ſufficient to bee maintained by their valour. Neuertheleſſe, the garriſon ſouldiors and the inhabitants (more to make a ſhew of their fidelitie
F and allegeance toward the Emperor, than for any hope they had to maintain the place) ſtanding vpon their guard & defence, Moyſes was conſtrained to plant his great ordnance againſt it, and to batter it, which he did, and in a very ſhort time with the furie of the cannon had betten downe the bulwarkes and flankers therof, and made a faire breach in the wall, ready now to haue giuen thereunto an aſſault, and to haue entred. Whereupon the beſieged not ignorant,

The taking of this citie much encouraged the rebell, reſolued there to make his reſi-ance, and the ſeat of his principalitie. Full eares of corne draw birds to pick vpon them, and the good fortunes of Generals ſouldiours to follow them: they forſake none but ſuch as are before forſaken of their better fortunes; to become ſlaues vnto gaine, and enemies vnto ho-nour. The Turkes and Tartars thirſting after theſe commodities, and allured with the ſmell of riches, repaired thither on euery ſide; in ſuch ſort, that the army of Moiſes increaſed in num-ber, his mind with hope, and his fortune with power. Armed with theſe aſſurances, he ſent for his wife and familie then at TEMESVVAR to come vnto him to CLAVDINOPLE, to bee parta- H kers with him of his good hap. And for that purpoſe ſent a conuoy of 400 Turks to conduct them on the way thither. Who being come to TEMESVVAR, and about to haue led the wife and familie of Moyſes out of the citie, were not ſuffered by the Ianizaries that had the guar-ding of the towne, ſo to do: who told them, That the great Sultan had in former times found ſo many diſloialties, trecheries, & treaſons in the Hungarians, Tranſyluanians, and Valachi-ans, to the great hurt and hinderance of his eſtate, that hee could no more aſſure himſelfe of them: and that doubting of the fidelitie of Moyſes, being a Tranſyluanian, he was reſolued to keepe this gage for his more aſſurance: aſſuring him withall, That his wife and family be-ing in his power, ſhould receiue nothing from him but fauour and grace, ſo long as he recei-ued from him the effects of his loyaltie, but that hee ſhould neuer hope to enioy them but in I TEMESVVAR, or ſome other ſuch like place aſſured for his ſeruice. Moyſes aſtonied at this an-ſwere, was much mooued againſt the great Sultan, complained in his ſoule, that hauing ruí-nated his faith, his honor, and the welfare of his country, to aſſure him of his fidelitie towards him, he yet doubted of his conſtancie, as if all theſe crimes did not bind him to ſerue him with his perſon for euer, were it euen but for feare of puniſhment from them whom hee had ſo grieuouſly offended.

In the meane time the ſuccours ſent from the Vayuod of VALACHIA were vpon the bor-ders of TRANSYLVANIA vnder the conduct of Marſa the Vayuod his lieutenant, and Baſta was gathering together his forces, to recouer againe his former ſtate; expecting euery houre the comming of two thouſand horſemen out of SILESIA, with which vnited power hee was K in good hope to diſcomfit the rebel, and to recouer his former loſſes. All which Moyſes by his eſpials right well knew, and for the remedie thereof reſolued to march with thirtie thouſand men to meet with the Valachians, and to cut them off, before they could come far into TRAN-SYLVANIA, or ioyne their forces with Baſta. For the furthering of which his purpoſe, he had learned the place whereby they were to enter, their number, and the way they were to hold, the better to conduct his armie againſt them; and being in number more than three to one, al-readie aſſured himſelfe of the victory. All which fell out according to his deſire: for the Va-lachians comming on, being in number but eight thouſand, fell as it were a prey into his mouth. For needs fight they muſt, or die therefore, although the number were vnequall; for that to flie was more dangerous vnto the Valachians (hauing the Turks and Tartarian horſ- L men at their backes) than manfully to fight it out. Neceſſitie gaue courage vnto the weaker ſide, and feare cauſed them to performe more than they would haue done, had they had li-bertie to haue fled: yet for all that the greater number at length preuailed againſt the leſſe; ſo that after a great and mortall fight, wherein a great number of the Turks and Tartars were ſlaine, the Valachians in the end were enforced to leaue their dead companions, their ho-nour, and their tents, with all their baggage in the field, and to betake themſelues to flight; but not all in rout as freſh water ſouldiours, but with often making ſtands, as men diſdai-ning by true valour, but onely with number oppreſſed, to bee ouercome. The Rebels proud of their victorie, and now fearing no more harme, forthwith gaue themſelues to the rifling of the enemies campe, diuided the ſpoyle, and filling the heauens with the noyſe of their M trumpets, publiſhing thereby the trophies of their victorie. Which diſorder the Valachi-ans perceiuing, and thereof conceiuing hope of ſome good to bee done, turned head, and ſerred cloſe together, couragiouſly thruſt themſelues into the middeſt of theſe proud and tri-umphant victors. Which vnexpected thunderclap ſo diſmaied them and troubled their wits,

A that ſurpriſed in diſorder, with their hands full of ſpoiles in ſtead of weapons, they could neither recouer their courage, nor put themſelues againe order. Such confuſion maketh men oftentimes to feele the blowes of death, before they bee aware of the arme that giueth the ſame: ſo, of theſe men ſo confounded, ſome ſtood as men amazed, otherſome ran away to ſaue themſelues, and otherſome ſtood vpon their defence, but all were alike ſlaine: ſo that in fine, this great armie was for the moſt part cut in pieces, and the reſt put to flight. Moyſes himſelfe was there among the reſt ſlaine, worthie for his treaſon to haue beene reſerued to a more ſhamefull death.

Moyſes with his army by the Valachians ouerthrowne, and himſelfe ſlaine.

Of this victorie the Vayuod by letters certified Baſta, to whom hee ſent fiue and twentie of
B the enemies enſignes for an honourable preſent, with this ioyfull newes of the death and ouerthrow of the rebell; whoſe bodie, as the Vayuod writ, was found dead among the middeſt of the dead, ſlaine euen at the firſt charge, wherein his guard was ouerthrowen. And for that it was commonly beleeued, that hee was not yet dead, neither preſent at that battell, as ſome had giuen it out, to manifeſt the contrarie vnto the world, and by his example to terrifie others, his head was vpon a launce ſet vp at CAROLSTAD for all men to behold: a preferment well beſeeming ſuch an ambitious head, as had made ſo great troubles, and beene the death of ſo many Chriſtians.

This rebell ſuppreſſed, another by and by ſtart vp called Albert Nage, who gathering
C together the rebels of TRANSYLVANIA, mingled with certaine Turkes, Tartars, Coſſackes, and Moldauians, all together amounting to the number of ſix thouſand, made head toward LIPPA. Againſt whom, Baſta with all ſpeed ſent foorth three thouſand Haiduckes well acquainted with the countrey, which ſometimes ſerued them to better purpoſe than their armes, for that the rebels ſought not ſo much to come to a ſet battell, and to trie the matter by true valour, as by taking the aduantages of places to delay the time and gaine purchaſe, the chiefe end of their rebellion. Theſe rebels the Haiduckes ſurpriſed, neere vnto a caſtle called FERRE, where they meant to haue lodged, and charged them. Who ſo vpon the ſuddaine ouertaken, and ignorant of their enemies power, ſuppoſing them to haue beene in number moe than indeed they were, made ſmall reſiſtance, but as a many of raſcals, gathered by villanie, and without truſting of one another, by flight prouided euerie
D man for himſelfe as hee might. In which flight the greateſt number of them were ſlaine, and their chiefetaine with much adoe ſaued, to bee at another time for his euill deſerts iuſtly executed.

New rebels in Tranſiluania diſcomfited.

Baſta by theſe good haps, and the aid of the Vayuod of VALACHIA, being againe become maſter of the field, in very ſhort time after had againe reduced all TRANSYLVANIA vnder the Emperours obeyſance; vnto whom he together with the Vayuod, for an honourable preſent and a teſtimonie of their good ſeruice, ſent to VIENNA, and from thence to PRAGE an hundred enſignes gained from the rebels. All which, with ſome other rich ſpoiles, the maſter of the Ceremonies in great pompe and triumph led, together with Moyſes the late rebels horſe, exceeding richly furniſhed with furniture of pure gold, and was for his paines by the Emperor

An honourable preſent by the Baſta ſent vnto the Emperour.

The troubles of TRANSYLVANIA thus once againe quieted, Baſta reſolued to beſiege TEMESVVAR, with his power marched toward LIPPA, there to meet with the forces of the Vayuod of VALACHIA, the better to vndertake and performe the intended exploit. His armie conſiſted of twentie thouſand men ſtrong, carrying with them fiue and twentie pieces of great ordinance, furniſhed with all things neceſſarie. And of the enterpriſe it ſelfe euerie man had good hope, as well for the ſufficiencie of him the Generall that had vndertaken it, as for the want of reliefe that was not any way like to bee brought vnto the beſieged. But while hee ſo lay at the ſiege thereof, his ſouldiours too greedily and exceſſiuely feeding vpon fruit (whereof there was that yeare great ſtore) fell ſo into the bloudie flix, and thereof
F in ſuch number died (although he had giuen moſt ſtrait commaund, That none ſhould be eaten, or vpon great penalties be brought into the campe) that he was glad to riſe with his armie and be gone.

Whileſt this was in doing, the Countie Solmes lying in garriſon at CAROLSTAD, tooke vpon him to ſurpriſe WISCENBOVRG, and ſetting foorth but with foure hundred ſouldiours of his garriſon, with wonderfull diligence ſurpriſed the place, and without any great reſiſtance reſiſtance became maſters therof. But the citizens ouer-grieued with the inſolent outrages of theſe men of war, opened the gates of their town vnto the rebels of TRANSYLVANIA, euen then fled from the late ouerthrow: who full of reuenge, tooke the place, and being too ſtrong for the Countie and his ſoldiors, made ſuch ſlaughter of them in the ſtreets (they of the town out of their windows, and from the tops of their houſes helping them) that of all thoſe which the Countie brought with him, there were but 60 left aliue; who all taken, were together with the Countie thruſt into a ſtrong and loathſome priſon. G

Now the bruit of the comming of the Turks great armie into HVNGARIE had awaked the Chriſtian forces to aſſemble themſelues together, and to doe their endeuour to withſtand the ſame; ſo that a number of companies were raiſed in GERMANIE, who came into HVNGARIE, marching toward STRIGONIVM, where the armie was to be aſſembled. The good ſucceſſe of things paſt, the opinion men had of the Turkes troubles with his rebels, and the great promiſes of the Emperour, drew many into theſe liſts of honour; in ſuch ſort, that there was come together an armie of fiue and twentie thouſand foot and tenne thouſand horſe; all good and braue companies, well appointed and well conducted. Of this braue and gallant armie the Lord Ruſſworm was for this yeare appointed Generall; who therewith marched within the ſight of STRIGONIVM, to aſſure the inhabitants of reliefe, if the enemie ſhould chance to beſiege them, as the newes then went. About three weekes this armie lay there by encamped, attending the comming of the reſt of the forces, which were to ſtrengthen and make vp the ſame; during which time Generall diſpoſed of all things neceſſarie for the keeping of STRIGONIVM, and put into the fort of S. Andrew neere vnto it three thouſand Lanſquenets for reliefe of the citie: which done, he remooued with his armie toward PESTH, and encamped within a league therof toward the weſt, reſolued ſo to croſſe the deſignes of the enemie if he ſhould attempt to beſiege this place (as it was doubted he would) and in hope that the preſeruation thereof might in time be a cauſe for the winning of BVDA, and a meane to impeach the enemies forces. H I

The Turks armie within a few daies after vpon a contrary deſigne conducted for the winning of PESTH (and reſolued to raiſe the Chriſtians campe) in number an hundred thouſand men, came, and face to face incamped within the ſight of the Chriſtian army on the other ſide of the riuer Danubius. In the meane time whileſt they ſo lay, certaine cowardly ſouldiors of PESTH, more in loue with their bellies than with their honour, by ſtealth fled out of their garriſon in PESTH vnto the Turks ouer againſt them in BVDA, ſhamefully crauing of them victuals; whom the Turks being themſelues almoſt in as great want, yet bounteouſly relieued. Beſides that, the Baſſa of BVDA to corrupt the reſt of their fellowes, cauſed theſe renegate fugitiues to be entertained with double pay: who therefore gaue the Baſſa a thouſand thanks, extolling his bountie vnto the heauens; and from the wals inuiting their companions to doe as they had done, and ſo to become partakers of ſuch bountie and pleaſure as they were. Howbeit, theſe fugitiues nothing profited the Baſſa, either by their perſuaſion or example: for albeit that they from the mouth of the Baſſa promiſed vnto their companions plentie of victuals, good entertainment, and foure moneths pay more, yet was there not any of them which hearkened or gaue eare vnto their allurements: but rather, the more to aſſure their commaunders of their fidelitie, of themſelues offered to be ſworne again vnto their allegeance vnto the Emperour, and to die in the place rather than to forſake it. Yet was the want of victuals then in PESTH great, and the garriſon therewith extreamely pinched, fed almoſt as much with hope, as with that little which was left them. Neither was it long after, but that according to their deſires the 15 of May a great ſhip arriued there, laded with wine and victuals ſufficient for the reliefe of their preſent neceſſities. Of the comming of which ſhip the Turke hauing heard, attended the paſſage thereof in the Iſle, to haue intercepted it. Of which their purpoſe the garriſon ſouldiors of PESTH hauing knowledge, and armed with neceſſitie, ſallied out vpon them, and killing a number of them, inforced the reſt to quit the place. This ſhip was but the forerunner of greater ſuccours; for ſhortly after followed a number of other ſhips: which arriuing at PESTH, laded with victuals and other neceſſaries, filled the place with as great plentie, as there had been before want. Which ſupply was conducted vnto PESTH by 500 harquebuſiers of STRIGONIVM, the Turks from BVDA looking on, but not daring or not able to ſtay the ſame. K L M

A It fortuned at the ſelfeſame time that a captain of the Turks fled from ALBA REGALIS to RAB, ſhewed vnto the Chriſtians there the way and the meane how they might come to the ſuburbs of ALBA REGALIS, and take the ſpoile of the ſame; yea, and happily, as things might fall out, find occaſion to ſurpriſe the town it ſelfe alſo; offering himſelfe to be the guid in the ſame action. And albeit that this Turke was an enemie to be feared and diſtruſted, yet the Chriſtian ſoldiors as men deſirous both of honor & of prey, and induced alſo with the probabilitie of the attempt, gaue credit vnto him, and embraced the ſame. Neither failed he of his promiſe, neither the Chriſtians of their deuoir in performance of the exploit. For the two garriſons of RAB and STRIGONIVM aſſembled togither, by the leading of this Turke ſurpri-

The ſuburbes of Alba Regalis by the Chriſtians ſacked & burnt

At the ſame time alſo the Chriſtians on the other ſide Danubius gathered an head togither to conduct another conuoy of victuals into PESTH, with a reſolution to march with the ſame through the plaine field at noone time of the day, euen in the eye of the enemie, ſo to braue him. And to this purpoſe the Lo. Nadaſti was there preſent with a good number of Hungarians, Colonel Aesbourg with a regiment of Almaines, and the Countie Thur with a number of Huſſars, all good ſoldiors and men of courage, deſirous to haue made proofe thereof vpon their enemies. This conuoy with the trumpets gallantly ſounding, brauely marched ouer the plaine at mid day, the Turks from the wals of BVDA beholding the ſame, but not daring
C to aduenture vpon it. And ſo PESTH for want of victuals before diſtreſſed, was now both by water and by land plentifully relieued.

Another conuoy of victuals by land put into Peſth.

The Chriſtians the laſt yeare hauing left the ſiege of BVDA for the reaſons before written, in their returne tooke the caſtle of ADOM, ſeated vpon the banke of Danubius, about two leagues from BVDA, and for the keeping thereof left therein a garriſon of Haiduckes. This caſtle was commodious for the annoying of the Turks in BVDA, and for the relieſe of the Chriſtians in PESTH, for that it impeacheth the bringing of victuals vnto the one, and fauored the victualling of the other. The good and faithfull defence of which place, theſe Haiducks vndertooke to the vttermoſt of their power, vpon their honour and credit, as they would be accounted valiant and couragious men: but yet refuſed to be bound by oath to render an ac-
D count of the place whatſoeuer might befal; a thing (as they truly ſaid) aboue their forces, and more than was in their power to performe. Theſe men now vpon the bruit of the comming of the Turks great armie afraid of their ſhaddowes, hauing before truſſed vp their baggage, ſet fire on the caſtle, & ſo departed, retyring themſelues to STRIGONIVM: where examined by the gouernor Althenne of the cauſe of their flight, and what enemies had chaſed them thence, and being not able to make therfore any excuſe, neither to yeeld therof any reaſon more than their imaginarie feare, were by his commandment impriſoned, there to remaine, vntill order were taken by the generall of the armie for their farther puniſhment.

The caſtle of Adom vpon a vaine feare forſaken by the Haiduckes, who had the keeping therof.

Sultan Mahomet now wallowing amid his ſenſual delights in CONSTANTINOPLE, yet found not therein ſo full contentment, but that his pleaſures had alſo their griefes fully mixt with E them. In CONSTANTINOPLE, the ſtrong ſeat of his mightie Empire, he was in the midſt of the inſolencies & mutinies of his proud Baſſaes and tumultuous Ianizaries, and abroad he was in wars both againſt his rebellious ſubiects in ASIA, and the Chriſtians in EVROPE. Vnto all which troubles he ſaw not how to giue remedie at once, & therefore reſolued (if it were poſſible) firſt to appeaſe the troubles abroad with his rebellious ſubiects in ASIA; as more deſirous to be at peace with his owne ſubiects than with ſtrangers: howbeit, that the puniſhing of rebellion is more neceſſarie in a prince for the maintenance of his ſtate, than is war againſt a ſtranger for the conquering of a new countrie or kingdome: the one preuenting the danger hanging ouer his head, the other ſeruing but his vaine and ambitious deſire: ſo he preferring peace with the rebels his ſubiects before peace with the Chriſtians his enemies, reſolued (as I F ſaid) to pacifie the firſt, the more eaſily to ruinate the other. But whether he vpon good faith or vpon policie entred into this reſolution, and whether he indeed meant plainly with theſe rebels, or but only to deceiue them, is hard to ſay. Howbeit, as the ſequele of the matter ſhewed, falſhood and treacherie was the ground of all this buſineſſe both on the one ſide and the other. For theſe men reſpecting only the ſafetie and aſſurance of their eſtate, held all other actions to them indifferent, whether they were good or bad, ſo that they ſerued to that effect:

Sultan Mahomet amongſt his greateſt pleaſures perplexed.

Mahomet in vaine ſeeketh to make peace with the rebels in Aſia.

and nouriſhed with the ſame milke of infidelitie that their prince was, trained vp in the ſame G ſchoole, and ſoſtered with the ſame ayre, feared in him againſt them, that which they felt in themſelues againſt him. An hard matter it is to aſſure minds fraught with like craft, ſubtiltie, and deceit, and poſſeſſed with like diſtruſt one of them of another. Howbeit, Mahomet ſpared no kind of cunning to deceiue theſe craftie & ſubtill men; offering vnto them, together with his gracious pardon, great preferments, dignities, and honours, ſo that they would but yeeld vnto him their due obedience, lay downe their armes, and no more take vp the ſame but in his ſeruice. But theſe wily foxes knew right well, that the promiſes of faithleſſe princes coſt them nothing but words, the honour and credit whereof they regarded not, ſo that thereby they might attaine vnto the effect of their deſires, which they eſteemed aboue all other things: ſo that for them to truſt vnto a thing of ſo ſmall value, with him that was ſo prodigall there- H of, and for the ſame ſo eaſily to yeeld vp their liues & fortunes, which they eſteemed as their onely treaſure, they thought right worthily to deſerue all ſhame and miſhap that might betide them. So that they not only refuſed to lay downe arms, and to yeeld their obedience vnto him, as he deſired, but euen to haue peace with him vpon any conditions whatſoeuer, ſeeing them dangerous vnto themſelues, and good only for him their enemie.

Mahomet ſeeing his offers reiected by the rebels of Aſia, couertly ſeeketh for peace with the Chriſtians.

Mahomet finding the rebels ſo reſolutely ſet downe, as not by any means but by force to be appeaſed, thought it now beſt to turne his purpoſe vnto the Chriſtians, and to offer them that which the other had refuſed, in hope that peace made with the one ſhould be the ruine and deſtruction of the other. Vpon which point he being in himſelfe reſolued, ſought now but ſome honeſt means, not vnbeſeeming his greatneſſe, to ioyne vnto this his proiect, to giue I him a way thereunto. For the eaſing him of which care, the French embaſſadour, then Leger at CONSTANTINOPLE, was very fitly then entreating with the Viſier Baſſaes for the deliuerance of the Countie Yſolan, taken at ALBA REGALIS the laſt yeare, and againſt all law of arms detained priſoner at CONSTANTINOPLE. This noble gentleman Mahomet thought fit as well for the ſufficiencie of himſelfe as with inſtructions to deale with the Emperour concerning an entreatie of peace to be had. Whereupon he commanded him to be ſet at liberty, with charge, That he ſhould both diſcreetly and faithfully deale with the Emperour concerning this matter of peace: which if he ſhould by his induſtrie effect, to the good liking and contentment of Mahomet the great Sultan, that then he ſhould become and remaine free, otherwiſe to returne againe into his former captiuitie and bondage; for whom the French K embaſſadour gaue his word, and became pledge. Vpon which barbarous conditions the Earle was forthwith deliuered, who by the law of armes ſhould not at all haue beene detained. Beſides this plot layd for the negotiation of this peace, Achmet Baſſa to this purpoſe writ to Collonitz, then Cammaunder of the Emperours armie in HVNGARIE. But ſee the copie of the letters themſelues.

The letters of Achmet Baſſa to Collonitz concerning a treatie of peace to be had.

To thee our friend Collonitz health and greeting. I ſuppoſe that you yet remember the propoſitions concerning peace which our ſoueraigne and moſt mightie Monarch not long ago cauſed to be opened and propounded vnto you by certain of his Baſſaes neere vnto STRIGONIVM, which as then remained not reſolued. But if now it ſhall ſeeme vnto you good, that we ſhould aſſemble our ſelues toge- L ther into ſome place of aſſurance both to the one ſide and the other, we may againe conferre about that buſineſſe, as hauing on my part full power and commaundement from my Prince ſo to doe, yet with charge, that before all other things STRIGONIVM ſhould be againe deliuered vnto vs. Which being done, wee may eaſily afterward determine the other difficulties, and conclude a good and wholeſome peace. God which raigneth alone in the heauens aboue is witneſſe of our faithfull and iuſt deſire, to aſſure a quiet and firme peace betwixt vs, and that to auert theſe flouds of warre from the poore people, and to giue them ſome repoſe and reſt after ſo great troubles. This is our intent and purpoſe, which God knoweth to be void of all fraud and guile; which we now declare vnto you, in hope to vnderſtand yours alſo. But if you be not reſolued to render vnto vs STRIGONIVM before we begin to intreat of any other matter, it is not needfull for you to trouble your ſelfe to giue any anſwere to theſe our letters. But if you M ſhall reſolue to the contrarie, to deliuer the ſame, with as much ſpeed as you can let vs in few words vnderſtand your reſolution, the time, and the place fit for our aſſemblie and meeting, to the intent fully to determine of theſe affaires. You know alſo, that you haue beene of long time accuſtomed to pay tribute vnto our Prince: which if you ſhall continue to pay for the time to come, and diſcharge the

A arrerages for the time paſt, it ſhall bee commodious for vs, and honourable for you, ſeeing that it is an honour vnto you to be tributaries vnto the Graund Seignior, it hauing alwaies in time paſt bin for your good and profit. Beſides that, peace ſhall likewiſe bee entreated of with the Great Cham of TARTARIE, who as commaunded by our moſt mightie and gratious Emperour vpon iuſt and reaſonable conditions to entertaine the ſame, and neuer more but in peaceable maner to come into HVNGARIE. Now, if that you ſhall neglect or reiect this treatie for peace, it is certaine that you ſhall be the author of the miſerie and ruine of the whole countrie, it being impoſſible that the townes and villages conſumed with fire ſhould euer recouer their former beautie or felicitie; God which raigneth in heauen is there witneſſe vnto me, and my dread emperor vpon earth, that I ſpeak frrankely with you, and without diſſimulation concerning this matter. Now on your part, let vs vnderſtand if you haue a deſire to attend
B vnto this treatie of peace, according to the purport of our letters: for if you ſhall reſolue to the contrarie, we proteſt vnto you to write no more concerning theſe affaires.

Collonitz hauing receiued theſe letters, ſent them forthwith vnto the Emperor, requeſting his Maieſtie to conſider what anſwere he would haue giuen vnto them. Whom the emperor, deſirous of a good peace, commanded to embrace the occaſion, & by proofe to learne whether the Turkes deſire were indeed conformable to their words, or not. Wherupon Collonitz taking vnto him certaine of the beſt commanders in the armie, vndertooke the buſineſſe, and entred into the treatie of peace with the Turkes: wherein he found the vnreaſonableneſſe of their demaunds to tend ſo much vnto the hurt and diſhonour of the Emperour, as that they
C euen at the firſt entrance ſhut vp the way to all farther or reaſonable conference, it being altogither impoſſible to bring to any conformitie minds ſet downe vpon reſolutions ſo far different. For the Turkes (as if the Emperour would haue beene glad of peace vpon any condition) after their proud manner, vnreaſonably demaunded to haue TRANSYLVANIA, STRIGONIVM, and PESTH reſtored vnto them; for which they offered to deliuer vnto the Emperour AGRIA and CANISIA, peble for pearles. So that vpon propoſitions ſo farre different, being able to conclude nothing, they departed on both ſides as they came, to trie by armes that which by talke and conference they could not agree vpon. But as all the Turkes treaties of peace with the Chriſtians are indeed but falſe ſhewes to abuſe the facilitie of the Chriſtians by, euen ſo now alſo it was knowne, that they in the meane time, whileſt this treatie of D peace was in hand, gathered together great ſtore both of men and munition at BELGRADE, wherewith to arme a great conuoy of victuals, which they had thought during this interparley for peace to haue put into BVDA. But Collonitz vnderſtanding thereof, ceaſed farther to entreat of peace, which with the falſe ſhew thereof did but hurt and deceiue the Chriſtians, and betooke himſelfe againe to his armes, his and their ſafeſt and ſureſt refuge, reſolued with the other captaines and commaunders of the armie to do what they might for the croſſing and hindring of the Turks in their purpoſe for the putting of victuals into BVDA: whereof there was now ſuch want, that the Turks in garriſon there hauing alreadie eaten all their horſes, and for victuals rifled the Gouernours houſe, were reſolued to abandon the citie, if they ſhould not be within ſome few daies relieued.

E Now vpon this reſolution for the keeping of the Turkes from the victualling of BVDA, the Chriſtians for the more aſſurance of their purpoſe, prepared therefore both by water and by land, embarking their footmen vpon the riuer, vnder the conduct of Colonel Altmeine and Saltze, the one the Gouernor of STRIGONIVM, and the other of PESTH; whileſt that Collonitz with the horſmen ſcouring alongſt the banks of the riuer of Danubius, tooke the charge by land. And ſo it fortuned, that vpon the 22 day of Auguſt he with his horſmen neere vnto the village of MOHATSCH (famous for the death of king Lewis) fell vpon the head of the Turks armie, led by the Baſſa Murat, conſiſting of ſix thouſand Turks, two thouſand of them being Ianizaries: who all togither lay encamped vpon an euen plain, verie commodious for our horſemen, who let ſlip neither the time nor the opportunitie of ſo great an aduantage of-F fered them, but forthwith charged them: where, after a number of notable charges both giuen and receiued, which ſtill abated both the number and courage of the Turkes, they at laſt retired toward the bodie of their armie, and that in ſuch haſt, as that their retreat little differed from a ſpeedie flight. After whom Collonitz followed, with like heate as hee had charged them, but euill followed by his friends, who euill performed their charge, ſeeking after

The Emperor aduertiſed of the Turks mot on for peace, giueth order to Collonitz for the entertaining thereof.

The Turkes vnreaſonable demands breake off all the treatie of peace.

A notable enterpriſe of Collonitz vpon the auantguard of the Turks army the ſpoile in ſtead of purſuing of their enemies; the Turks perceiuing the ſmall number that purſued them, turned vpon them, and ſo began againe not only to make ſtrong reſiſtance, but euen right hardly to charge them. Who ſo by them preſſed with no leſſe courage than power, were now glad themſelues to retire in ſtead of purſuing of the victorie; but yet ſo, as that the retreat was made without any great loſſe therein receiued. Howbeit, the Turkes not a little encouraged with this change of fortune, and perceiuing themſelues too ſtrong for their enemies that charged them, came on ſo faſt and ſo couragiouſly, as that in fine they had defeated the Chriſtians, had not the Haiduckes out of their boats from the riuer in good time come reſolutely to their reliefe. Which cloud the Turkes perceiuing, readie to poure forth a great tempeſt vpon their heads, and not daring to abide the ſame, againe retyred, leauing the Chriſtians victors both in the firſt and laſt charge: who not content with the retreat of the Turks, furiouſly charged them, and purſued them euen vnto their great campe, and ſo returned, carrying backe with them both the glorie of the field, and the ſpoile of their enemies.

Collenitz in good time relieued by the Haiduckes.

In this conflict the red cornet of Murat Baſſa, the cogniſance of his great commaund, was taken, with two field-pieces, ſeuen hundred Turks were left dead vpon the place, & ſix ſcore mo taken priſoners; amongſt whom was Saxar Beg: who being a man of vnderſtanding, and by the Chriſtians examined, confeſſed, That Haſſan Baſſa the day before this conflict came into the campe, and there honourably dined with the great Cham: with whom after their great cheere he entring into diſcourſe of many great matters, & among the reſt, concerning his returne into his countrie, was much againſt the ſame, vntill ſuch time as they had new victualled Bvda, wherunto he was (as he ſaid) both in honour and in duetie bound to giue his aſſiſtance, the loſſe of this good place being of ſo great importance vnto the Great Sultan. That otherwiſe his aid had bin vnto him rather hurtfull than profitable, his people hauing deuoured ſo much victuals and performed nothing, if he ſhould now at this time faile to doe his Prince ſeruice, who could neuer thinke either valour or fidelitie to be in him, if he ſhould faile in ſuch actions as wherein his valour and fidelitie ſhould appeare; all things hauing no other credit and reputation, but according to their effects. And that therefore he ſhould reſolue to ſee the end of this exploit, which required euery mans helping hand for the performance thereof, conſidering the forces of the enemie in readineſſe to hinder the ſame. Moreouer, he aſſured them, that the Baſſaes purpoſe was to new fortifie Hasvvar, Pax, and Kalbtsch, frontier caſtles, and neceſſarie for this action, and ſo to goe to the ſiege of Pesth; and that done, to beſiege Strigonivm; which for all that he doubted to win this yeare, as well by reaſon of the approch of Winter, as for that a great part of his forces were far off, and not eaſily in a little time to bee aſſembled togither. That the Tartars were yet a great way from the campe, where the Baſſas of Asia and Caramania were within a few daies expected; the one of them leading with him the reconciled rebels of Asia, and the other 6000 Ianizaries. Which his confeſſion although it were not altogither true, yet carried it ſome ſhew of probabilitie, as time by proofe afterward declared.

The Turkes aſſaires and deſignes made knowne vnto the Chriſtians by Saxar Beg, by them taken priſoner.

Some of our men were in this charge ſlaine alſo, but few in compariſon of the Turks, who there loſt ſome of their beſt men. It was noted, that in this conflict the ſouldiours of Colonell Sultze had euill behaued themſelues, refuſing to purſue the enemie being in flight, whether it were for that they feared ſome ambuſh laid for them, or for that they diſdained to follow the Generall Collonitz: the reaſons perhaps for which their Colonell ſtaied them from the purſuit of the enemie, but to euill purpoſe: for being out of order at ſuch time as the Turkes turning backe, renewed the fight, they had beene all ſlaine and cut in pieces, had not the Haiduckes in good time (as we ſaid) come on to their reſcue. As for Collonitz, he moſt brauely bare himſelf in this conflict, ſo much as in him was vrging his good fortune, for the obtaining of a full victorie; ſometime performing the part of a good captaine, and ſometime of a valiant ſouldior; ſometime forcing the charge, and againe ſtaying his men in their retreat: inſomuch, that oftentimes loſt amongſt his enemies, and againe returning by the grace of God, hee eſcaped death as it were by miracle, and from being taken priſoner, by chaunce. Into neither of which daungers hee could haue fallen, without the daunger of the whole armie; which, next vnto God, was for the ſafetie thereof beholding vnto the valour of him, their ſo braue a leader. But God in his wiſedome createth not ſuch worthie men, but by his prouidence

The negligence of certain Chriſtian ſouldiors forgetfull of diuers duelies.

The great and braue endeauor of Collonitz to haue obtained the victory ouer the Turkes.

A uidence alſo to preſerue them: wonder it were otherwiſe, that euer ſuch worthie men ſhould returne from amongſt the middeſt of ſo many deſperat dangers, death as it were enuying at their liues, and their enemies for their glorie chuſing them out to triumph of their ſpoyles and ouerthrow. And without doubt, had the reſt of the Chriſtians after his example proſecuted their good fortune, and done what good ſouldiors ſhould of dutie haue done, their enemies had bin quit ouerthrown, and they themſelues had bin both victorious and rich, where now for lacke of good reſolution the victorie was almoſt equall. For beſide the ſpoiles by them gotten, they might haue carried away with them a whole yeres pay, due to the garriſon of BVDA, which the Turks (put into a feare, and carefull onely of their liues) had left in their camp; which they afterward againe recouered, vpon the recouerie of their force and courage.
B This mony, with much more, was all appointed as a prey vnto the good fortune of our men, had their valour had the courage to haue gone to fetch it; but failing of their endeauour in ſo glorious an action, fortune failed them alſo of her bountie.

A great & rich bootie loſt through the negligence of the Chriſtians.

Now at length the armie of the Chriſtians was met togither, about the fourth of September, wherein the Lord Ruſſworm commaunded as Generall: who deſirous to vnderſtand of the Turkes affaires and deſignes, ſent forth two of his moſt truſtie and expert ſouldiours to performe that piece of ſeruice: who in Turkes apparrell being got into the Turkes armie, were there eight daies vndiſcouered or ſuſpected of any. Where, after that they roaming vp and down, had taken a full view of the Turks armie, and in what they might diſcouered their deſignes, they returning backe, declared vnto the Generall what they had there both heard
C and ſeene: as that the Turkes armie was verie great, but yet not ſuch, as that which the laſt yeare had beſieged PESTH: That the Turkes lay encamped at large, and not cloſe togither, which cauſed their armie to ſeeme the greater, taking vp for the lodgement thereof halfe a league, being well prouided of cannon and other field pieces: That Haſſan Baſſa commaunded therein as Generall, hauing brought with him twelue thouſand Ianizaries, beſide his horſemen, and reconciled rebels of ASIA, which were daily looked for, the leader of whom was not knowne: ſome thinking it to be him, who had alwaies commaunded them, being a moſt valiant man, and expert commaunder; but ſome other deeming him to be but one of his captaines that had forſaken him (as indeed he was) a right valiant man alſo, but not of ſo great experience as hee: That the great Tartar Han, come to aid the Turkes in their wars
D in HVNGARIE, was (to the great diſcontentment of Haſſan Baſſa the Turks Generall) now alreadie returned towards his owne countrie (with ſuch bootie and priſoners as he had got from the poore Chriſtians) to appeaſe a rebellion there raiſed by a young Tartar prince his nephew, who by his vncle the great Han (giuen in hoſtage vnto Sultan Mahomet, and kept at CONSTANTINOPLE as in priſon) hauing found means to make an eſcape, and to returne into TARTARIE, was about to trouble his vncles affaires, in hope now in his abſence to mount vnto the throne of his eſtate: And that the Tartar being come to the banke of Danubius, and by the Turks denied boats to paſſe ouer the riuer in (and with many railing and opprobrious ſpeeches by them charged for his departure as a coward) had found means to make a floting bridge of great faggots, whereby he paſſed his footmen ouer the riuer, his horſemen
E ſwimming ouer the ſame; and ſo was by great iournies returning home, boaſting by the way as he went, that he had reiected and troden vnder foot all the prayers and requeſts of Haſſan Baſſa, entreating him yet to ſtay a while in HVNGARIE for the ſeruice of the Great Sultan his maſter. Beſides that, that they had ſeen ſix great veſſels vpon the riuer of Danubius, with ten leſſer veſſels following of them, manned with three thouſand ſouldiors well armed, and men of good ſort, three hundred of them being Ianizaries, appointed to ſafe conduct the munition to be brought vp the riuer, & to ſerue for a conuoy vnto the other veſſels that were to follow them with victuals, if haply the Chriſtians ſhould attempt to do any thing againſt them. And in fine, that the Turks armie could not this yere poſſibly be great, by reaſon of many great lets wherwith the great Sultan was this yere troubled: which much abated both the courage
F and hope of his captains; who hanging their heads, came vnwillingly to theſe wars, accounting themſelues happie, if they might in this expedition but take PESTH, that they might not returne ſo much diſhonoured, as they came danted and diſcouraged. With which newes the Chriſtians were ſo much encouraged to encounter with the Turks, as if they had bin aſſured to fight with men alreadie diſcouraged and out of heart.

The L. Ruſſworm Generall of the Chriſtian armie by his eſpials certainly enformed of the eſtate of the Turkes armie.

The Turkes ouerthrown by the garrison of Strigonium.

In the meane time the Huſſars of STRIGONIVM, alwaies readie for fight, by good fortune going forth, met with foure hundred Turkes ſeeking for forrage: who encountring together, at the firſt made a moſt braue and gallant fight, euerie one of them wiſhing, that their priuate ſucceſſe might be the beginning of their generall victorie. But the Huſſars being both more skilfull in that maner of skirmiſhing and ſudden encounter, and alſo of greater courage, at length brake the Turks rankes: of whom, ſix ſcore lay dead vpon the ground, moſt of the reſt were taken priſoners, with an hundred and thirtie good an ſeruiceable horſes, wherewith both the glorie and the profit of their victorie was encreaſed. Colonell Sultze alſo with three hundred men marching out from the campe, chaunced to diſcouer an hundred of thoſe braue horſemen, which but newly came out of ASIA with Zellaly the rebell; who hauing neuer ſeene the armie of the Chriſtians, nor yet felt of their forces, were with three hundred Ianizaries vpon a brauerie come ouer the riuer of Danubius, to take a view of the Chriſtian campe: for the drawing on of whom, the politique Colonel had ſent forth fiftie of his horſemen a great way from the reſt of his troupe, as it were to diſcouer the countrie thereabout. Theſe fore-runners fayled not to meet with the Turkes, as if it had bin by chaunce, and were by them forthwith charged, as thinking to haue had a great hand ouer that ſo ſmall a number; when vpon the ſudden Sultze with the reſt of his companie comming on, and hotely charging them, encouraged his owne men, and diſcouraged the Turkes: who ſurpriſed with feare, thinking the Chriſtians to bee moe in number than indeed they were, hauing left ſome fiftie of their men dead vpon the place, as men diſmayed and void of vnderſtanding fled. In which flight, ſuch as were not by the Chriſtians ſlaine, were in the riuer of Danubius drowned, whereinto they for feare all headlong plunged themſelues.

The Turkes defeated by Colonel Sultze.

The General of the Chriſtian armie prouidētly fortifieth vpon the riuer of Danubius.

All theſe little conflicts ſerued but as ſparkes to kindle the great fire by the Baſſa entended, his firſt purpoſe being to put a conuoy of victuals into BVDA, which the Chriſtians thought by all meanes to hinder; which ſo contrarie intentions were not but by force and policie to be decided. The Chriſtian Generall wiſely doubting leaſt the Baſſa ſhould come and lodge his armie betwixt VICEGRADE and BVDA, and ſo victuall the citie at his pleaſure, raiſed a ſtrong fort of an old church betwixt the ſaid two places, and therein lodged a regiment of Lanſquenets. Beſide which fort, called the fort of S. Andrew, he built another at the head thereof in the Iſle of VICEGRADE, in ſuch order and proportion, that theſe two forts might one of them defend the other and annoy them that ſhould attempt to force either of them. Together with this commodiouſneſſe, the fort in the Iſle kept the paſſage vpon Danubius, free and open for the bringing of victuals and other neceſſaries to the campe of the Chriſtians; and was but a league and an halfe from BVDA: into which fort was put a regiment of 4000 Italians, being all very wel armed. Which done, he made a bridge of boats vpon the riuer, which began in the campe, and ended at the Iſle, for the relieuing of the fort, and ſo from thence paſſed quite ouer the riuer to VACIA, a little towne, which it was needefull for the Chriſtians to keepe.

Theſe forts finiſhed according to the neceſſitie of the time, it was not long after, but that the Baſſa ſent tenne thouſand Turks both horſe and foot to take the firſt of them, which they ſuppoſed to haue beene but weakely fortified. Who comming thither, were with ſuch courage receiued by the Lanſquenets with their harquebuſes, as that the whole fort ſeemed to haue beene on fire. Wherewith the Turks diſmaied, as men in their expectation deceiued, and in approching of the ſame hauing ſome of their men ſlaine, and moe hurt, they ſounded a retreat, and hauing done nothing, but loſt a number of their men, returned to their campe from whence they came. In which enterpriſe they failing, they reſolued vpon another, and began to make a bridge ouer Danubius, in hope therby to paſſe ouer, and to annoy the Chriſtians on the other ſide of the riuer. Whereof the Generall of the Chriſtians vnderſtanding, ſuffered them without any interruption to ſpend the time in performing of the ſame. But certainely enformed by his eſpials, both of the day and houre wherein they were about to paſſe ouer, he laid an ambuſh of foure thouſand Lanſquenets and two thouſand Reiſters for them, in ſuch place as from whence they might without danger do great harme vnto the enemie, and aſſure the bodie of the Chriſtian armie. The riuer of Danubius had growing vpon the bankes thereof, and eſpecially in the deſolate and vnfrequented places, great ſtore of flags

A and reeds; which were now thick & high enough to couer theſe footmen in, hauing with them foure culuerins ready charged. Behind this ambuſh lay colonel Collonitz with his regiment, & in the head of it the prince Ioinuille, with a certaine number of French gentlemen, who vpon a braue courage, and a deſire they had to ſee ſeruice, had followed him into thoſe warres. There was alſo the lord of BASSOMPERRE, another French lord, with his owne priuate followers, in number few, but in valour great. Vpon the flanks lay foure troups of Carabins French men, Loranoiſes and Wallons, moſt expert and reſolute ſouldiors.

The Turkes hauing made their bridge, began now to paſſe ouer the ſame, being charged by ſome few ſtragling and looſe forerunners of the Chriſtians, ſent before for that purpoſe: B whom the Turkes not much regarding, ſtill preſſed on, in hope to ouertake them, and to cut them in pieces, not aware of the ambuſh laid for them, nor of their enemies counter deſignes. The footmen in the meane while lying ſtill cloſe in the reeds in ambuſh, beholding how and in what order they paſſed, and expecting but the time when they were to begin their charge: But hauing perceiued ten thouſand of the Turks to be now come ouer, and making head toward them, the Wallons vpon the banke of the riuer (as was before appointed) firſt diſcharged their pieces vpon them, and ſlew ſome few of them. Neuertheleſſe the Turks ſtill paſſing on by them, ſlew of them alſo about foure and twentie, and ſo keeping their way, marched directly toward the Chriſtians. But this their forwardneſſe was quickly ſtaied, and their courage abated: For in paſſing by they were vpon the ſudden aſſailed by the Lanſquenets and Reiſters, now riſen out of ambuſh, and by them hardly laid vnto on euery ſide; as alſo by the C horſmen, who now come in, had put them into ſome diſorder before they were well aware of them. The Wallons alſo at the firſt by the Turks ſcattered, but now againe rallied, and deſirous to reuenge the death of their friends and fellowes, now plaied their parts, and on another ſide right furiouſly charged their enemies. During all which fight the culuerins ceaſed not to open the flanks of the Turks battell, with the loſſe of a number of their men, by the furie of them rent in pieces. Neither did Collonitz forſlow ſo faire an opportunitie, but afront charging this diſmaied companie, by plaine force cauſed them to giue ground; the Carabins in the meane time charging them vpon their flanks, and the Wallons behind. Who thus on euerie ſide beſet, and hardly layed vnto, as men diſcouraged, and out of hope to be relieued, turned their backs and fled amaine, to haue recouered the bridge wherby they came ouer. In D which fight and flight two thouſand of them being ſlaine, and the reſt not able to recouer the bridge, driuen headlong into the riuer, were therein drowned and ſlaine to the number of fiue thouſand of them, thoſe which remained aliue being all taken priſoners. Amongſt the reſt one of the Baſſaes, a man of great account amongſt the Turkes, was ſlaine, with many other captaines and commanders of great note, and fifteene hundred Ianizaries. There were alſo foure field pieces taken, with thirtie enſigns, and two cornets, beſide a very rich prey of braue and couragious horſes, with much faire armour, rich apparel, and good ſcimitars, weapons of no ſmall account and price among the Turks. This ouerthrow much abated the courage and hope of the reſt of the Turkes for comming to the effect of their deſignes; and increaſed the courage and hope of the Chriſtians, reaſonably well hereby aſſured of the good ſucceſſe of E their affaires, for this yeare in HVNGARIE.

The Turks falling into the ambuſh laid for them by the Chriſtians, receiue a notable ouerthrow.

About this time Sultan Mahomet hauing put a fleet of gallies to ſea, to haue gone againſt the king of FEZ, was certainely enformed, how that the ſame with tempeſt ſore beaten, to auoyd ſhipwracke, was againe returned vnto the ſame port from whence it looſed, bringing backe with it nothing for all his great charges, but ſickneſſe and great loſſes at ſea receiued. The like euill hap or worſe hauing at the ſame time alſo betided another fleet by him ſet out into the Euxine or blacke ſea, to defend thoſe ſea coaſtes from being rifled and ſpoiled by the rebels in ASIA, who with their daily incurſions did there ſtill great harme. For albeit that Zellaly one of the captaines of the rebels, allured with Mahomet his faire promiſes, was by the ſtrait of the DARDANELLI (called in ancient time the ſtrait of HELLESPONT) come with 12 F thouſand good ſouldiors, out of ASIA into EVROPE, and ſo marching through MACEDONIA, was come into HVNGARIE, there to doe his lord and maſter ſeruice: yet the chiefe rebell held ſtill out, and both now and for diuers yeres after maintained a moſt cruell and dangerous warre, to the great trouble of the graund Seigniour, and the hindering of his affaires. And euen now the craftie rebell hauing made ſhew as if hee would haue ſubmitted himſelfe,

and come ouer into EVROPE as Zellaly did; and had therefore certaine gallies ſent vnto him from Mahomet, to haue tranſported him and his ſouldiors in: he now of them poſſeſſed, ſlew all them that were ſent therin, & kept the gallies to himſelfe. So that ſo farre from was it, that the rebellion was extinguiſhed in ASIA, and the rebels ſuppreſſed, as that they were now vp in greater number than euer, and ſo did alſo more harme. Whereunto they were alſo the more encouraged by the example of Haſſan Baſſa (not him the Generall in HVNGARIE, but another Baſſa of the ſame name) who by the great Sultan ſent againſt theſe rebels, had for a time kept them vnder, and ſomewhat repreſſed their inſolencie: but now by Mahomet diſplaced, and another being ſent to ſucceed him, he therwith diſcontented, ſo animated & incenſed his ſoldiors againſt him, as that comming to haue taken vpon him his charge, hee found moſt part of the ſouldiors ready to turne their weapons vpon him: ſo that at length they fell together by the eares about the matter, ſome taking part with the old General, and ſome with the new. In which tumultuous quarel a number of ſoldiors were ſlaine, all they of the richer ſort ſpoiled, and the great Sultans ſeruice and authoritie neglected. But the new Generall armed with his princes authoritie, and ſome of the old ſoldiors alſo taking his part, at laſt preuailing, Haſſan the old Generall with his partakers, were glad to flie and ſhift for themſelues: who for all that hauing afterward gathered together the diſperſed ſouldiors, and ioyning with the reſt of the rebels, held ſtill the body of a good army on foot; by his example ſtirring vp the people to rebellion, croſſing the ſeruice of his ſoueraigne, & doing what harme he could, ſo to ſeeme vnto his followers the more valiant. The Perſian king on the other ſide, taking the aduantage of theſe the Turks troubles at home, as alſo of his wars with the chriſtians, at the ſame time with a great armie beſieged the great citie of TAVRIS, as then kept by the Turks with a moſt ſtrong garriſon. In which ſiege he for battery vſed the help of the canon, an engine of long time by the Perſians ſcorned, as not beſeeming valiant men; vntill that by their owne harmes taught, he was now content to vſe it, being with the ſame, as alſo with skilfull canoniers furniſhed by the Portingals: By which means he in ſhort time after againe recouered this great citie from the Turkes, being before by Sultan Amurah taken from Mahomet the Perſian king, but now againe reſtored vnto the Perſian kingdome.

The great citie of Tauris beſieged and taken by the Perſian king.

Sultan Mahomet thus on euery ſide beſet with troubles, and not well knowing which way to turne himſelf for to remedy the ſame, being in mind much troubled and perplexed, began to enter into conſideration of the vanity of theſe worldly things, & of the frailty of his eſtate. And ſo ſtruck as it were with a remorſe of conſcience, & a firm beliefe that God did thus chaſtiſe & puniſh him for his offences, conſidering that his anceſtors had neuer bin troubled with any ſuch attaints or diſgraces, he conuerted all his thoughts vnto praiers towards God: and therfore gaue commaundement for publike praiers to be continually ſaid in all the Moſquies or churches throughout all his dominions, giuing himſelfe wholy alſo vnto ſuch deuout exerciſes and works of charity: and withal ſent two of his moſt reuerend prieſts bareheaded and barefooted, on pilgrimage to MECHA (where the chiefe temple of their great prophet is, and wherin they vainly beleeue their ſuperſtitious praiers to be of him moſt ſpeedily heard) there to pray vnto him for the health and proſperitie of him their prince and ſoueraigne.

At the ſame time Amurat Rais, an old pirat, the Turks Admiral for the weſt part of the Mediterranean, roaming there vp & down, and doing what harme he could, chanced to light vpon a great Flemiſh ſhip, which hee with his gallies forthwith encloſed, the calmeneſſe of the weather then fauouring him, & hindring the Flemings, their ſhip being able to make no way. Who ſo beſet, & hauing made a great fight againſt the whole fleet, and ſlain a number of the Turks, & ſore rent diuers of their gallies, though not without loſſe of many of their own men alſo, being not able longer to fight, and ſeeing themſelues now boorded by as many Turks as could wel ſtand vpon the hatches of the ſhip, & their gallies hanging round about her, as men of inuincible courage, and reſolued to die, and yet to ſell their liues at as deere a rate as they could, laid all the powder they had left in the ſhip on an heape together, & therunto vpon the ſudden put fire, by force wherof the Turks with the hatches were all blown vp, the Flemings with their ſhip rent in pieces, together with diuers of the gallies that were faſt grapled vnto her, and an incredible harme done vnto ſuch other of the gallies as were neere vnto her. Men worthie alwayes to vanquiſh, ſeeing that they feare nothing more than to bee themſelues vanquiſhed: and more worthie to haue liued for the glorie of men, than by their crueltie to haue

A haue periſhed to the diſhonor of men. The old pirat aſtonied at ſo great and deſparat a reſolution, hauing in this exploit loſt much, & gained nothing, haſted to the ſhore to repaire his rent gallies, and ſo to put to ſea againe: Where he had not long been, but that he by chaunce (and that ful ſore againſt his will) met with the great duke of FLORENCE his gallies, accounted the beſt gallies in the world, and ſuch as now at this preſent moſt troubled the Turks deſigns. At which meeting, after many a thundring canon ſhot on both ſides diſcharged, not without the apparant loſſe on the Turks behalfe, when they ſhould haue come to haue grapled together, and to haue fought hand to hand, a thing which the Florentines moſt deſired, as in hope to haue made that famous pirat the prize of their victorie: he not willing ſo to do, ſuddenly
B turned about and fled; after whom the Florentines followed amaine, and in the chaſe ſunke ſome of his gallies, and tooke other ſome full of great riches: and ſo brake the credit of this old and renowned pirat, as that for a great while after hee was little by the Chriſtians feared vpon that coaſt. But leauing Mahomet to his deuotions, and the old pirat to bewaile his loſſes, let vs againe returne to ſee what the great armies of the Turks and of the Chriſtians, did more in HVNGARIE.

While theſe armies lay encamped the one attending vpon the other, many an hot skirmiſh paſſed betwixt them, moſt wherof ſorted vnto the hurt & loſſe of the Turks. Amongſt others it fortuned, that a troupe of aduenturers going out of the Chriſtian army to ſeeke after bootie,
C fell vpon a like troupe of the Turkes, come out for the like purpoſe: where after a ſharpe encounter on both ſides giuen and receiued, the Turks at length put to the worſe and defeated, betooke themſelues to flight, hauing left a number of their fellowes dead vpon the place, and loſt two of their enſignes, with an hundred and thirty horſes of ſeruice. In which chace the Chriſtians hardly purſuing them, draue a number mo of them into the Danubius, wherein they moſt miſerably periſhed: and tooke a great many mo priſoners, amongſt whom were found aboue fourſcore Italian renegates, who brought into the campe, were as enemies vnto God, in a martiall court all condemned to bee hanged, and ſo accordingly executed, ſauing the captaine himſelfe, who for the regard of his place was beheaded.

Shortly after the great Baſſa riſing with his armie, came in the beginning of October and D encamped neere BVDA, both for the preſeruation of the place, and the ſaſtie of his army, now greatly diminiſhed both in number and courage. For it was certainly known by diuers fugitiues from the Turkes, that in theſe many conflicts they had loſt a number of their beſt ſouldiours, but eſpecially of their Ianizaries. So that the Baſſa for the ſupplying of that defect, was glad to make choice of ſix thouſand of his beſt ſoldiors, whom armed with muskets and ſcimitars, the proper armes of the Ianizaries, he entertained into the roomes & pay of the Ianizaries that were dead and ſlaine: the reſt of his armie for the moſt part conſiſting of bare and feeble baſe raw ſoldiors. Beſides this, that all the army was ful of mourning and lamentation, the ſoldiors in all places bewailing the loſſe of their brethren, their friends and companions: ſo that in ſtead of their wonted threats and brauerie, nothing was to be heard but ſighing and complaining. And moreouer, that the generall opinion conceiued of the greatneſſe of the E chriſtian army (imagined to be much greater and ſtronger than indeed it was) had ſtruck ſuch a feare into the minds of the Turks, as that they were reſolued, BVDA being once victualed, to returne home, all their other proud deſignes for this yeare ſet apart: which was the cauſe that they had diſlodged with their armie, and drawne neere vnto the citie, the better to attend to the new victualing therof, & ſo to be gone; accounting themſelues right happie, if they might but performe that good piece of ſeruice and ſaue themſelues.

The Turks army greatly diminiſhed and diſcouraged.

The Chriſtians before in doubt leaſt the Turkes ſhould haue beſieged PESTH, as they had before giuen it forth they would, and ſeeing them now to be riſen with their armie and encamped neere vnto BVDA, reſolued to follow them, and in what they might to croſſe their deſignes: and thereupon leauing PESTH, as now out of danger, they roſe alſo, and came and en-
F camped before the fort in the iſle of VICEGRADE, betwixt the ſaid fort and VACIA, where they ſtayed foure dayes; and then by a bridge which they made vpon the Danubie, whereby to paſſe from the iſle where the Italians lay in garriſon, vnto the fort of S. Andrew, kept by the Lanſquenets, they with the whole armie paſſed the riuer, and ſo came and encamped before the fort of Saint Andrew, in the face of the enemie. Now the field betwixt the heads of the two armies was plaine and open, without woods, buſhes, or riuers, to hinder the ioyning of of a ſet battell. In which ſo fit a place, the Chriſtians encouraged with the feare of their ene- G

mies, and the diminiſhing of their number and courage, whereof they had got knowledge as well by their tumultuous riſing, as by other aduertiſements, were deſirous in ſo fauourable occaſions, to haue giuen them battell; and for the deſire they had thereof, were come thither to ſeeke it: which the Turkes on the other ſide ſought as much to ſhun, not daring to aduenture themſelues vnto the fortune of a generall battell, for all the bragges they had made. Neuertheleſſe, very ſhame arming them with ſome reſolution, they put forth into the field a battalion of fiue thouſand men, fiue daies after that the Chriſtians were encamped, on that ſide of the riuer. This battall of the Turkes came marching on, within halfe a quarter of a league of the Chriſtians; which they would not haue done but vpon the confidence of a greater number following of them, hauing behind them ten thouſand men both horſe and foot H layed as cloſe as they poſſibly could a little out of the way. Now the Chriſtians thinking of no other forces ready to fight, but thoſe which appeared in their ſight, ſent forth twelue hundred men againſt theſe fiue thouſand Turkes, to skirmiſh with them, vntill the whole armie were put into order, euen for a generall battell that day to haue been fought, if the Turkes ſhould accept thereof, whereunto the Generall, the Colonels, captaines, and ſouldiors in generall, were fully enclined, the whole armie with great cheerefulneſſe marching on foot, at this lowd alarme of their common deſire. Which had not failed to bring forth great change of effects, had the Turkes been likewiſe diſpoſed for the producing of the ſame. But they be the extraordinarie fauours of fortune, when fit occaſions ioyne themſelues with braue reſolutions, and ſuch reſolutions with meanes to effect the ſame. This is the let of many moſt no- I ble trophies, which moſt commonly faile, either for lacke of fit occaſion, or for lacke of good reſolution for the performance of them. But as moſt men iudge of other mens conceits by their owne inclination, ſo the Chriſtians themſelues reſolued to giue battell, thought the Turkes their enemies to haue beene of the ſame reſolution: and thoſe fiue thouſand men to haue been the head of the auantguard, followed with the whole armie, comming to draw them out to skirmiſh vntill the comming on of the reſt of their forces. Howbeit their deſigne was quite contrarie to this the Chriſtians hope, for their purpoſe was onely to traine them out into their ambuſhes, ſo without danger to cut them in pieces. Of which their purpoſe they gaue ſufficient teſtimonie; and cauſe of ſuſpect, for that the skirmiſh hauing continued three houres, with ſome loſſe on both ſides, the Turkes armie appeared not: and theſe fiue K thouſand Turkes now in skirmiſh, by little and little retiring, ſought ſo to haue drawne the Chriſtians into the danger of their ambuſh. Which their manner of fight cauſed the Chriſtians to ſuſpect the matter: for it was not like, that fiue thouſand men ſhould giue ground to twelue hundred, if they had not had ſome ſecret meaning therein, which they ſought to effect to their more aduantage. Which cauſed the Chriſtian Carabins which followed them, not to be too earneſt in purſuing of them, and more cloſely to ſerre themſelues together, the better to endure the ſhocke of their enemies, if they ſhould charge them. Neither were they in that their prouident feare deceiued: for the Turkes ſeeing their purpoſe diſcouered, and themſelues now out of hope to effect the ſame, vpon the ſudden made a ſtand, and ſo preſently comming on, hardly charged the formoſt of our Carabins: who as men halfe ſurpri- L ſed, to ſee themſelues ſo readily and reſolutely charged, by men who but now made ſhew as if they would haue fled, were not able ſo valianty to receiue the charge (conſidering the great number of them by whom they were charged) but that ſome few of them were ouerthrowne and ſlaine, with ſome of the Hungarians amongſt them. Howbeit they made good reſiſtance, and right valiantly repulſed their enemies, of whom they ſlew a good number alſo. The preaſe in this conflict was great, euery one deſiring to ſhew himſelfe braue and courageous in the head of his owne armie. But new ſupplies ſtill comming in, the Turkes in fine ſhrunke backe and retired, hauing left three hundred of their fellowes dead vpon the place, accompanied with an hundred of the Chriſtians there ſlaine likewiſe. Now vpon the retreat on both ſides, euery man in his conceit appointed the next day for the general day of battel: M the bragging ſpeeches of the Turkes giuing the Chriſtians occaſion ſo to thinke; for why, they ſeldome or neuer refuſe battell being offered them by the Chriſtians, as well for the confidence they commonly haue in their multitude, as for the fooliſh opinion they haue of the ineuitable predeſtination of men to life or death: accounting it amongſt them an eternall infamie,

A famie, to refuſe any combat againſt the Chriſtians; which howſoeuer it fall out, ſhould ſort to their aduantage, by vanquiſhing gaining the fruites of their victorie; and by looſing their liues in battell, to gaiue the ioyes of heauen: being vainely perſuaded, no mens ſoules to go more readily vnto heauen, than the ſoules of ſuch as die in battell againſt the Chriſtians. Such effects old ſuperſtitious opinions are able to worke in the minds of men, euen to the deſperat aduenturing and ſpending of their liues. Howbeit that this effect for this time witneſſeth, that theſe men with all theſe aduantages as much feared the danger, as any other poore faint hearted men: and that a ſtrong apprehenſion of feare is able to preuaile againſt all cuſtoms and perſuaſions, be they neuer ſo old; as alſo againſt all other accidents whatſoeuer. For why, the
B Turks contenting themſelues with their great bragges and vaine threats, came not forth according to their promiſe, neither could by any meanes be drawne to aduenture themſelues vnto the hazard of a generall battell. The loſſe of their great and choyſeſt men diſcouraged and deterred them from aduenturing all to the hazard of ſo great a perill. For (as I haue ſaid) almoſt all their Ianizaries and moſt valiant ſouldiours were dead or ſlaine, and the reſt, men of ſmall ſpirit or courage, reſerued that little which was in them, for the ſafeguard of themſelues, and not for the gaining of any notable victory. They had alſo in theſe ofen conflicts loſt all their Eraſbles, which are a deſperat kind of ſoldiors, fighting on horſeback without ſaddles, hauing onely a little piece of tapeſtrie vpon their horſes backes, and by the readineſſe of their horſes, do for a long time in one ſort maintaine their fight. They cary light darts
C made of ſtraight and faire canes, excellently well made, and ſtrongly armed: and their handy weapons are good ſables, or broad and ſharpe curtelaſſes. Theſe men a great while fought moſt valiantly in the laſt combates, but in fine were all ſlaine, except ſome few which caſt themſelues into Danubius, and were there drowned. The loſſe of which men much diſcouraged the Turks: for why, their ſeruice ſtood them in great ſtead in receiuing the enemies charges, and with their bodies couering of the Turkes ſquadrons in their greateſt perils and combats. Howbeit the Turks receiued not theſe loſſes without returning of ſome part thereof to vs again: For Collonitz had a little before fallen into great danger of his perſon, and loſt ſome of his followers in an enterpriſe of great moment, had the effect anſwered vnto the proiect thereof. While the Turks yet lodged in the iſle of VICEGRADE, he cauſed eight great
D field pieces to be ſo placed, as that therewith he ſo annoyed the Turkes, that they were about to haue forſaken the place. And the more to force them ſo to do, the ſecond of October hee embarked himſelfe with 600 Haiduckes, vpon the Danubius, and ſo by night with great ſilence landed neere vnto the enemies, thinking ſo vpon the ſudden to haue ſurpriſed them. Which for all that could not ſo ſecretly be done, by reaſon of the comming on of the day, but that the Turks were thereof aware: who therupon with great preaſe iſſued out of their trenches, and with all their force & power charged him. Againſt whom he made head, rather vpon a braue & conſtant reſolution, than vpon any confidence be had in his forces, not hauing men ynow to withſtand the leaſt part of his enemies. Which his ſo great reſolution ſo abated the Turks furie, as that they ſtood a good while in doubt to charge men ſo reſolued. The field
E pieces which he had brought ouer with him into the iſle, then ſerued him to good purpoſe, beating them backe with their murdering bullets, who with their number thought to haue ouerwhelmed him. Which good help oppoſed againſt the number of the enemies, for a time balanced the victorie, and wrought the death of many on both ſides. This maner of fight endured the ſpace of two houres, maintained more by reſolution, than by ſtrength and power. At length for all that the Turks with their number preuailing, the Chriſtians therwith rather oppreſſed than vanquiſhed, forſaking their field pieces, diſorderly retired toward their boats. After whom the Turks eagerly following, in that purſuit ſlew 400 of the Haiduckes, the reſt with much ado recouering their boats, carying with them their Generall, by them hardly defended from the furie of the enemie. Which loſſe hapned not ſo vnto the Chriſtians, but that
F it was mingled with ſome loſſe of the Turks alſo, of whom the moſt forward and couragious were in that fight ſlaine, as was afterwards knowne by certaine priſoners of theirs afterwards taken, who made report of the loſſes by them there receiued. The Turks by this ſo deſperat & dangerous an attempt warned to preuent the like for the time to come, caſt vp great trenches in the iſle alongſt the bank of Danubius, wherin they placed certain of the Ianizaries & other their beſt ſoldiors, who there lay vntil the diſlodgement of the camp to go to lie before BVDA.

The Turks refuſe to come to a generall battell with the Chriſtians.

Eraſbles what manner of ſouldiors they be among the Turks.

The

The Turkes had before built a bridge of boats at LAMASCIN, which gaue them passage into STIRIA, where they did great harme, for the strengthening whereof they had built at both ends thereof a strong fort, well furnished both with men and munition. This bridge so commodious for the Turkes, and hurtfull to the Christians, Trantmestorf Gouernour of STIRIA, and a great commaunder in those parts, with his Stirian troupes, and some good aid brought vnto him by the Countie Serin, vndertooke to breake. Vpon which resolution hee vpon the sudden approached one of the aforesaid forts, and so right furiously assailed the same, before they in the fort were well aware of his comming. In which doing he caused the greatest noise and stirre that was possible to be made with trumpets, drummes, and clattering of armor, as if it had bin some great armie imploied in that action, the more to terrifie the besieged. Which so great and dreadfull a noise ioyned vnto so braue an attempt, with so great courage begun, strucke such a terrour into the minds of the Turkes, that they without any great resistance quitted the place, and fled ouer the bridge to the other fort. Of which forsaken fort the Christians became masters, and withall speed prosecuting their good fortune, presently drew out therof three canons, and therwith battered the other fort. In which the Turkes, hauing no other place of refuge to flie vnto, nor hope of safetie but in their last valour, so well behaued themselues, as that the christians had much ado to force them. Howbeit a breach being made by the fury of the canon, and scaling ladders set vp, the fort was on euery side assaulted, which the Turkes for the space of fiue houres so valiantly endured, as that it was hard to say who should preuaile or haue the better. In this assault were many on both sides slaine, the Turkes not being to be ouercome, but with the losse both of their liues and honor; nor the Christians able to retire without losing the fruit of that their so great and rich an enterprise: So that the assault was with great resolution on both sides maintained, the Turks fighting for their liues, and the Christians for their honor, vntil that at last the Turks with much slaughter ouercome, the fort was by the Christians taken, and most of the Turks therin being slain, and the rest taken prisoners, both the forts were forthwith rased, and the bridge broken, which before had serued for an ordinary passage for the Turkes to forrage and spoile the Christian territories by. The boats wherof the bridge was made were all burnt, and some great ordnance therein found, broken in pieces, and cast into the riuer.

At the same time LVGAZE, a place of great importance for the seruice of the emperour, and so neere vnto the Turks, as that they could hardly attempt any thing thereabouts, but that it might from thence be discouered & knowne, was by the Transyluanians deliuered to Basta, Generall for the emperor in that country. From which place he sending out certain scouts toward BELGRADE, they brought in with them certain prisoners; who being examined, said, that Hassan Bassa the Turks Generall in HVNGARIE, had writ to Giaffer Bassa the Gouernor of TEMESVVAR, That he should only attend to the preseruation of his towne, without attempting any thing farther against the Christians, the present estate of their affaires so requiring: And that hauing reuictualled BVDA, his purpose was for this yere to returne, in hope of some good peace to be ere long concluded betwixt the great Sultan and the Emperor.

Lugaze a strong place deliuered to Basta.

The two armies of the Turkes and of the Christians, lay still neere the one of them vnto the other, the Turkes carefull for the reuictualling of BVDA, and the Christians still intentiue to their doings, and desirous in what they might to hinder and frustrate the same. Which because they could no way better doe, than by offering of them battell, they thereupon generally resolued, vpon a Friday being the seuenteenth of October, the day by them assigned for the battell (hauing by the shooting off of three canons giuen warning vnto the souldiors throughout the campe, for the preparing of themselues first toward God, and then to the seruice of their prince, after they had well refreshed themselues) in good order tooke the field, and so stood ready ranged there, either to giue or to accept of battel. Before whom the countie Ringrane was sent forth with his regiment, about halfe the way betwixt the two armies, to discouer the mouing of the enemie, and to receiue his first charge, if occasion should so require. Whose scouts before sent forth, about noone discouered a troupe of horsemen come out of the Turks campe, about some businesse they had to do, but to them vnknown: whom the scouts supposing to haue been the forerunners of the Turkes armie, and by them almost surprised, in hast retired back again, & by their hasty retreat put the whole army in an alarme, which came brauely marching on, in hope now to haue come to trie the matter by true valour

The Christians offer the Turkes battell.

A lour, and by the fortune of a generall battell to haue made that day for euer famous by their victorie and the ouerthrow of their proud enemies. And in the heat of their so great courage like ynough it was for them to haue performed the same, had the Turks had but so much courage in them as to haue met them in the field, as was well hoped they now would. But they with their former losses discouraged, and resolued only vpon the safegard of themselues, and the victualling of BVDA, had no mind to enter into these honorable lists, but kept themselues close within the couert of their tents and the strength of their trenches. And so the Christians with a false alarme moued, and hauing for the most part of the day in vaine expected the comming forth of their enemies, returned into their campe deceiued of their expectation.

The Turks refuse to accept of battell offred them by the Christians.

The same day there was an espie taken, whom they which tooke him, thought to haue
B bin a Turke, howbeit he was found to be one of their owne men; by whom they were better enformed of the cowardise of the Turks, of their purpose for the shunning of battel, and of their resolution for the keeping of themselues within the safegard of their trenches, and that they so did, aswell for the losses they had before receiued, as for diuers other vnluckie accidents, which caused them to misdoubt some euill succes in the end & winding vp of this their expedition. Neuertheles, the Christians not greatly trusting to these reports, still kept their armie in readines, to giue their enemies battell vpon the least occasion offered them. Howbeit, that indeed they had no great cause of feare, the Turks hauing no desire at all to come to a generall battell: so that in stead of great effects that were expected, the time passed but in light skirmishes and vaine alarmes betwixt the two armies; vntill that at length the Turks hauing
C by the riuer sufficiently stored the citie of BVDA with victuals, the great Bassa secretly by night rose with his armie, and so retired toward BELGRADE. Which so base a retreat differed not much from a cowardly flight, being with such silence made vnder the darke couert of the night, as that the Christians had therof no perceiuing vntill that the were quite departed and gone. This victualling of BVDA & of some other few places of the Turks in HVNGARIE, was all that the great Bassa did this yeare with his great armie, whereas at his first comming it was giuen out, that he would therwith take both STRIGONIVM and PESTH from the Christians.

The great Bassa hauing victualled Buda, secretly by night riseth with his armie, and so retireth out of Hungarie

The next day the hastie and sudden departure of the enemie being perceiued, the Generall of the Christians called togither the colonels and other great commaunders of the armie, to consult with them, what were best to be done in so vnexpected an occurrent? Of whom, some D were of opinion, That it was best forthwith in all hast to pursue their fearefull enemies: othersome for many reasons dissuading the same, and othersome withal propounding some other notable exploits to be taken in hand. But in conclusion, the safest point was resolued vpon, which was, not to hazard any their troupes in pursuing of their flying enemies, who were hardly to be ouertaken; but now immediatly after their departure to attempt the taking in of some one of their strong holds: where, amongst others that were propounded, HATVVAN was thought to be the most necessary place, being so seated, as that beside the great harme it did to the Christians thereabout, it much hindered both aduertisements and victuals to be brought vnto PESTH. Which exploit resolued vpon, they forthwith rased the fort of S. Andrew, & the fort by them built in the isle of VICEGRADE, because they should not stand the Turks in any
E stead after their departure, and so with all their power set forward toward HATVVAN. This towne is seated beyond the riuer of Danubius toward the North, about eight leagues from BVDA, crossing the way to TRANSYLVANIA and CASSOVA, vpon a faire and euen plaine, neere vnto a great and deepe marish, and was sometime defended with good & strong wals, with a castle, and three large & deep ditches; for a long time in the power of the Turks, and which without losse a great while held out against the valiant baron Teuffenbach, by whom it was most straitly in vaine besieged: vntill that afterward it was againe besieged by Maximilian the Archduke, the emperors brother, then generall of his armie in HVNGARIE in the yeare 1594, vnto whom it was by composition surrendred, after it had for a certain space bin by the Turks notably defended: who considering the harm this place did vnto the emperors territories, by F reason of the situation thereof, wherin a great and strong garrison of the Turks alwaies lying, forraged all the Christian territories as farre as the riuer Vague, yea, and oftentimes tooke booties as far as STRIGONIVM, and by spoiling of all that side of HVNGARIE, caused the countrie to pay contribution as far as TERNAVIE, standing within foure leagues of the mountaines which seperat HVNGARIE and MORAVIA: all irreparable losses to the Christians, and hardly to be auoided: For which reaſons he cauſed it then to be diſmantled, and to be made vnſeruiceable for the wars. After which time for all that, the Turks, for the commodiouſnes of the place, had with great labour againe new fortified the ſame, with wals made with great pyles of wood and faggots, with earth rammed in betwixt them; a ſtronger kind of fortification, and better able to withſtand the furie of the cannon, than are wals of ſtone: in which ſort the Turks vſe moſt commonly to fortifie ſuch places as they mean to defend, and which oftentimes coſt much for the Chriſtians to gaine the ſame from them. Hatwan again fortified by the Turkes.

This place thus fortified, and both with men and munition well furniſhed, and with all things needfull ſtored, was able to endure a great and long ſiege, whereunto the garriſon therein was as reſolutely ſet downe, as were the Chriſtians to attempt it: where now, at their firſt comming vnto it, a part of the Italian regiment, aſſiſted with 300 Lanſquenets, vnder the leading of Countie Sultze, and Graſold Generall of the Italians, were appointed to go before the reſt of the armie, and to begin to make the approches: which they did by forcing of a water-mill, driuen by the water of the mariſh, not paſt a musket ſhot from the towne. Wherein while they were buſied, the Turks ſallying out of the towne, came to fight hand to hand with the Chriſtians, and had with them a ſharpe combate, the Turks fighting for the defending of the place and of their liues, and the Chriſtians for the gaining of the ſame, and for their honour. Which ſo contrarie a reſolution in that conflict coſt the liues of many, and amongſt others the life of Graſold, General of the Italians, there ſlaine with a harquebuſe ſhot, vnto the great hurt of the whole armie, but eſpecially of the Italians, now depriued of ſo great & expert a commaunder. At laſt for all that the Turkes were enforced confuſedly to retire againe into the towne, hauing in this ſallie loſt a number of their men alſo. The Chriſtians neuertheleſſe hauing driuen the Turkes backe into the town, went forward with their buſineſſe in making their approaches, and placing their gabions to couer their cannon: wherein the Turks with their great and ſmall ſhot did them great harme, but eſpecially with their murthering pieces, charged with nailes and other ſmall pieces of yron. Howbeit, by the comming of the Lo. Ruſſworm with the reſt of the armie, the approches were the next day brought on, & the batterie planted ſo neere vnto the towne, as that the Turkes could not without moſt manifeſt danger and loſſe any more ſally out, to trouble the Chriſtians in their works. The firſt inconuenience the beſieged felt, was the want of water, which through the diligence of our men was ſoone taken from them, the cannon right furiouſly battering the wals in the mean ſpace. Wherewith the Turks diſcouraged, and now out of hope to be relieued, thought it not beſt for them to expect either whileſt a breach were made, or an aſſault giuen, but by parley to preuent theſe dangers, in hope ſo to come to ſome eaſier compoſition, while yet they ſtood in their whole ſtrength. And ſo parley by the Turkes demanded, and by the Chriſtians granted, and hoſtages for the ſuretie thereof on both ſides giuen, they ſent two of the chiefe men amongſt them to entreat of the ſame: who at the firſt demaunded, That their liues and libertie ſaued, they might with bag and baggage depart. Whereunto anſwere was giuen them, That they ſhould only with their liues and libertie be gone, with ſome few hundreds of their worſt horſes of courteſie giuen them, to carie them to ſuch place as they meant to retire themſelues vnto, and to deliuer into the hands of the Chriſtians all ſuch renegats as were in the towne.

Now the beſieged Turks carrying yet the markes of the crueltie by the Wallons exerciſed vpon them in the former ſiege, when as the ſame town was by force taken, & filled with dead bodies of all ages & ſex, and doubting now this ſecond ſhipwreck, with like miſerie threatned vnto them by the Chriſtian Generall, if they ſhould expect the dreadfull euent of a generall aſſault, accepted of theſe hard conditions, ſeing no better could be obtained; & ſo couenanting, that they with their families, their liues, and liberties ſaued, might with a ſafe conuoy bee conducted vnto ſome place of ſurety within their own territory, they promiſed to giue vp the town. Which agreement on both parties reſolued vpon, they ful of ſorrow and heauines with their families departing out of the town the 29 of Nouember, were by colonel Andaſt, with certain Huſſars, ſafely conducted to Solnoc. The Chriſtians entring the town, found therin great ſtore of victuals & munition, the houſes full of corne, and other neceſſaries, & the ſhops ſtored with weapons, ſhot & pouder, with 24 pieces of great ordnance ready mounted, which might haue well ſufficed for the defence of the place. But all theſe things are but acceſſories vnto one principall, that is to ſay, to reſolution, without which they are but of ſmal force, and

A with which they are able to doe much. Beſide that, the place it ſelfe thus furniſhed well conſidered, ſeemed almoſt impoſſible to haue beene forced; but eſpecially now that Winter was come on, which might haue brought a thouſand ſtormes and difficulties, by the Chriſtians not to haue beene endured: So that euery man beholding the ſame, with his eyes caſt vp towards heauen, gaue God the praiſe, for taking away the Turkes courages in their ſo great aduantages, and encreaſing of the Chriſtians in their no leſſe difficulties: vnto whom the glorie of this victorie was wholly attributed, ſeeing that contrarie to all apparance and mans forces he had giuen to the Chriſtians the victorie, no way able by their owne forces to haue bin gained. But God which in his prouidence from heauen beholdeth all things vpon earth, diſpoſeth of the ſame as he ſeeth beſt for his glorie, and the welfare of his: ſo that in this action he
B was the only pilot which brought this our ſhip into the hauen of health; for the haires of our head are of him numbred, and euen the leaſt creatures vpon earth are by him regarded.

Into this new gained towne the Chriſtian Generall put a good and ſtrong garriſon of a thouſand Lanſquenets and fiue hundred Hungarians, part horſemen, and part footmen, for the keeping of the place, and of the countrie thereabout: Which done, he retired with his armie toward PESTH, which he relieued with victuals, and ſtrengthened with the troups of the colonels Collonitz, Geisberg, and Rouer, who were there billited to paſſe the Winter, & to preſerue the place againſt the deuiſes and enterpriſes of the Turks of BVDA, who were ſtill deuiſing and practiſing for the regaining thereof.

The time of the yeare for ſouldiors any longer to keepe the field now paſt, and the great
C armie of the Turks riſen and gone, the Lo. Ruſſworm breaking vp his armie neere vnto STRIGONIVM, cauſed all the enſignes by him this yere gained from the Turks, euen 64 in number, to be gathered togither, all very braue and gallant; all which he ſent with great pompe and triumph to VIENNA, for a preſent to the Archduke Matthias; who receiued them with great thankes giuen both vnto the General that ſent them, and the ſouldiors that had gained them, and bountifully rewarding them that had brought them. They of VIENNA at the ſame time highly commending the Generall, and not a little reioycing to ſee thoſe ſame enſignes, now in their power within the citie, which not long before had proudly braued them in the field.

The L. Ruſſworm breaketh vp his army, and ſendeth the enſigns gained from the Turks, for a preſent to the Archduke Matthias.

Now after the breaking vp of the Chriſtian armie, a great number of inſolent and ſeditious ſoldiors, eſpecially of the regiment of colonel Altmein, roming vp & down the countrie
D to ſeeke for bootie, moſt cruelly rifled and ſpoiled the countrie villages, with the inhabitants therein, as well the Chriſtians as the Turkes, ſparing no more the one than the other: whoſe outrage not otherwiſe to be ſtaied, they were by commandment from the Emperor by force charged at WIDHOF, and 230 of them being brought in priſoners to VIENNA, foure and thirtie of them were there for example hanged, and the reſt as men not worthie of entertainment caſhiered.

Inſolent ſoldiors iuſtly puniſhed.

The time of the yere hauing (as we ſaid) broken vp the army of the Chriſtians, the regiment of the countie Reingrane was put in garriſon into the villages of CHIANTE and TERNAVIE, alwaies at hand with the enemies, as fitteſt to repulſe them. Theſe ſoldiors were alwaies kept in doings, ſtill fighting whileſt others were at peace, and mannaging their armes, whileſt others
E hanged theirs by the wals. For beſide the trobles they had with the Turks, their nigh but bad neighbors, the very inhabitants of the countrie (who held all that might hurt them, for enemies, were they neuer ſo much their friends) oftentimes, & that for little or no occaſion at all, tooke vp armes, & right furiouſly charged them as their mortall enemies. Of which combats there was no end, the countrie peſants ſtill ſtriuing to rid themſelues of ſuch gheſts. So that theſe valiant men ſtill enforced to buy their bread with the price of their bloud, as men become deſperat, vſed the Chriſtians as they did the Turks, diuiding all things with them by the ſword. But in theſe ſmall and often fights mo men were ſlaine & loſt than would haue bin in a general battel, ſome good number either on the one ſide or the other being euery day ſlain: Which daily inconueniencies cauſed theſe ſoldiors to reſolue to go to ſeeke their liuing elſe-
F where, rather than in the midſt of the graues of their fellowes. Wherunto they were the rather induced, for that but a little before the troupe of captaine Clinchampe, the beſt and braueſt of the whole regiment, was one night right furiouſly aſſayled, and almoſt ſurpriſed by the countrie peſants. Wherefore they departed out of HVNGARIE into AVSTRIA without victuals, apparel, or mony, their pay due vnto them for 17 months being kept from thé. A cruelty full of couetousnesse, and a couetousnesse full of crueltie, by wrong and hard dealing to leaue those G men to the desperat extremitie of hunger, who for our safetie had exposed themselues to all manner of danger. For if the Prince (as he may of right) demaund the liues of his subiects in his seruice, as bound vnto their loyaltie, they may also of right require due prouision for their maintenance: of which two offices where one faileth, the whole state must needs fall.

For prouiding wherefore, great was the wisdome of Augustus, who laid vp the publicke reuenue apart by it selfe, to defray the publick charge; and that which was his owne priuat, to serue his owne priuat vses.

These poore souldiors thus resolued, craued leaue of the bishop of Bresbovrg to passe by the suburbs of his towne, without doing therein any harme: which their request he courteously granted; and so according to their word they indeed passed, not so much as once wish- H ing for that they durst not once touch. Which their so quiet passage caused the bishop to furnish them with boats, wherby to passe ouer the riuer which diuideth Hvngarie frō Avstria.
The pesants of Austria seeke by force to stay the passage of the souldiors of the Reingraues regiment into their countrie.
Which once knowne vnto the pesants of Avstria, they assembled themselues together, to the number of 1500 men, and cast vp a fort vpon the bank of the riuer, with three faulconers in it, resolutely set down to keepe them from comming ouer into their country. Which their so forward a resolution for a while staied these men of warre: who to auoid further trouble, courteously requested passage of these men, promissing all their good behauior in passing qui etly through their countrie: which the carles in most churlish manner refused to graunt, with proud threats of the danger of their liues, if they should by force attempt the passage, & not with quietnesse returne. With which brauadoes of the countrie churles these troupes of mar- I tiall men prouoked, resolued by force to remoue these lets, and by the sword to open themselues a way: so turning the head of their baggages toward the fort, as if they would haue there passed, while the pesants stood gazing vpon them, Camgaillard with his troupe of horsemen vnperceiued of them tooke the riuer a little higher vp, and by swimming gained the farther banke; after whom captaine Clinchamp with his troupes immediatly followed also. In which passage they were much troubled with great flakes of yce, with the great deepnesse of the riuer, with the steepnesse of the bankes where they were to land, and many other difficulties: all which they regarded not, to be reuenged of their enemies. These valiant men being got ouer, vppon the sudden surprising these rude countrie churles, and furiously charging of them, quickely ouerthrew them and cut them in pieces: of whom, 300 were lefe dead vpon K the place, as many mo hurt, & the rest put to flight. Which was no sooner done, but that the rest of the troupes of the regiment without let passed the riuer, and so ioyned themselues vnto their victorious companions. Seuen weekes this regiment stayed in Avstria, and so longer had, but that vpon the complaint and request of the nobilitie & of the people of the countrie, they hauing for 17 months pay due vnto them receiued nine moneths pay, were licenced to depart. Which was a great ouersight in them that had to do therewith, at once to disband so many good men, as had not their like amongst all the rest of the emperors garrison; & who being staied with a little mony, might with their good seruice haue stood the emperor in great stead: as by proofe afterward appeared; when as the emperour by necessitie forced to call them togither againe, could not of all that strong regiment raise but three companies; the rest L being some of them returned into their owne countries, other some of them gone to serue in other places, or else otherwise dispersed. Of which three companies, the first was giuen to Camgaillard, the second to Baltazar Marades, a Spaniard, and the last to Iohn Paul an Italian:

Which three captaines had before commanded in the Reingraues regiment, and done the Emperor good seruice, as they did afterward also.

Diuers happie conflicts of the Christians with the Turkes and Tartars.
The rest of this yere ended in Hvngarie, with diuers other encounters & combats, fortune therein still fauouring the Christians. As, 300 Haiducks, going forth to seeke for bootie, by good hap chanced to meet with a companie of the Turks being very rich, and diuers of them men of good account; amongst whom, the Gouernor of Mohatz was one: all whom these Haiduckes cut in pieces; to be born withall, for shewing no fauor vnto them, who most M cruelly had before spoyled them of their parents, lands, and goods. Besides that, they tooke the Gouernour of Copan, with his sonne, and 24 other very rich Turkes, with 170 horses of seruice, and eight fat Oxen prepared for their prouision, Which fat booties drew forth other souldiors also to seeke out for the like: of whom, certain troups of the Christians going forth toward

A toward BATSVVAR, a towne of the enemies, met the Gouernour of the towne and of the territorie thereabout come out with his garriſon againſt them; where betwixt them was made a right hot and ſharpe fight: wherein at the firſt encounter the Turks ſeemed to haue the better, but in the end the Chriſtians taking courage, ouerthrew them and cut them in pieces. In this conflict diuers priſoners were taken, with three enſignes, & many other rich ſpoiles. This happie exploit was ſeconded with newsagreeable thereunto out of MOLDAVIA, whereof the Vayuod by a curror ſent of purpoſe, gaue our men to vnderſtand; which was, of the generall ouerthrow of the Tartars: who hauing with all manner of crueltie waſted the countrey, had in the end made the inhabitants ſo deſperate, that repoſing more comfort in a ſpeedy death,
B the end of all miſeries, than in a lingring life, turmoiled with ſo many intollerable calamities, they generally arming themſelues, ioyned themſelues with their Vayuod, ſo to trie their laſt fortune. With which reſolution they in battell encountring with the Tartars, gaue them a great ouerthrow, a number of them being left dead vpon the field, and the reſt put to flight, and chaſed out of the countrey, the Moldauians notably reuenging their former loſſes, and in their owne territories burying their enemies.

Neither were the Turks in this cold and hard time of the yeare on their parts idle, but ſtill plotting of their great and notable deſignes, euen through the middeſt of the froſt and ſnow to haue been performed. The Baſſa Beged hearing that the Lo. Baſta lay with his troups diſperſed in the countrey about LIPPA, in great ſecuritie by reaſon of the extremitie of the time,
C altogether vnfit for men to keepe the field: and therefore imagining it to be no great matter, now amidſt the froſt and the ſnow to ſurprize him, acquainted three other of the Turks captaines and commanders therabout with the matter, who liking well thereof, with 5000 men all together ſet forward, in hope to haue vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed him. But he an old expert captaine, and not ſo careleſſe as they ſuppoſed, had his ſecret ſpies ſtill abroad among them: by whom he, aduertiſed both of their purpoſe and of their comming, reſolued in both to preuent them; and to that end hauing called together his forces, ſet forward to meet them in the mid way, and ſo before they were aware to intercept them; neither failed he of his purpoſe: for meeting with the Turkes fearing no ſuch matter in place of diſaduantage, and vpon the ſudden charging them round, they, deceiued of their expectation for the eaſineſſe of the vi-
D ctorie promiſed them, as men diſmaied after ſome ſmall reſiſtance fled. Aboue eleuen hundred of them being in this conflict ſlaine, and the reſt put in rout, and driuen into the riuer Maruze, there periſhing; ſome few only by ſpeedie flight with the Baſſa eſcaping. Twentie of the Turkes captaines were here taken, with ſome few other priſoners, and a great and rich bootie.

Beged Baſſa thinking to haue ſurpriſed the L. Baſta, is himſelf by him ſurpriſed and ouerthrowne.

Much about the ſame time George Barbell, one of the chief of the rebels in TRANSYLVANIA, acknowledging his fault, came to CLAVDIONOPLE, to take the oath for his allegeance vnto the Emperor: by whoſe example a great number of others moued, came in and ſubmitted themſelues alſo: and haply he being a good & valiant captaine had done much more for the ſeruice of the emperor, had he not bin by death preuented; for ſhortly after he ſuddenly died.
E The other rebels moued neither by his example, nor by the comming in of ſome others of their companions, made choiſe of one Bethlin Habor (a moſt renouned captain, and of great reputation amongſt the ſoldiors) for their chieftaine: who proud of ſuch a choice, immediatly after ſent an herauld vnto Baſta, to wil him forthwith to deliuer vnto him all the countrie of TRANSYLVANIA, as to him that was of late choſen prince therof, or els to denounce vnto him moſt cruell war: and to tell him farther, That if he refuſed ſo to do, he was in good hope by his owne forces, without any aid from the Turke, to driue him out, being well aſſured of the faithfull deuoir of the Tranſyluanians. At whoſe proud threats Baſta ſmiling, only ſhewed him his open hand in ſigne that he accepted of his proud threats, not vouchſafeing him any other anſwer at all. This glorious boaſter bare himſelfe the higher, for that he had maried the F widow of Moyſes the chief rebel, wherby he had gained both great riches, & much credit and reputation among the common people, both which hee enioyed but a while: for the fourth day after that he was maried he died, and ſo was buried. Baſta neuertheleſſe, for the better aſſuring of the ſtrong places of TRANSYLVANIA, put into them garriſons of his moſt faithfull Germanes, and diſpatched Crauſenich away toward the Emperor, to requeſt of him a ſupplie of a thouſand horſemen and foure thouſand foot, without which he thought it impoſſible to p reserue and keepe the prouince troubled with so great factions, and so earnestly sought after by the Turkes: And farther to certifie him, that the little forces he had left was not sufficient for the keeping of the places beset with so many enemies, and all lying as it were in their mouthes: That the prouince swarmed with seditious people, one thrusting another forward in mischiefe and rebellion, as the eares of wheat driuen with the wind doe one another in the field: That the Turkes were alwayes making of new incursions, which hee was not able to represse without greater forces, which he expected from his Maiestie with all speed possible; protesting, for want of such supply to be in time sent vnto him, to lay the losse of the prouince vpon the negligence of them which might and ought to haue sent the same, acquiting himselfe for the losse thereof, seeing that hee durst not to repose any trust or confidence in the faith of the citizens and inhabitants of the townes although they were disarmed, for hauing so often falsified their faith, and put their prouince in danger of vtter ruine and destruction. But leauing these troubles of TRANSYLVANIA and HVNGARIE, let vs a little step back to see what happened among the Turkes themselues, after the departure of the great Bassa with his armie out of HVNGARIE.

Mahomet the great Sultan had (as is before declared) by great promises made vnto his rebels, sought to appease the rebellion in ASIA, and by that meanes drawne Zellaly, one of the chiefe rebels, with twelue thousand good soldiors out of ASIA in EVROPE, and so into his warres in HVNGARIE, vpon an assured promise made vnto him of the gouernment of BOSNA: the hope whereof, as it had drawne him into these late warres, so had it also encouraged him with his gallant troupes of most braue horsemen to doe the best seruice he could, so to shew himselfe worthie of so honourable a preferment: which he right notably performed during all the time of the Bassaes abode in HVNGARIE, to his owne great commendation, and the furthering of his lord and masters seruice. But the Bassa with his weake armie tetired out of HVNGARIE, and the Bassa himselfe returned toward CONSTANTINOPLE: Zellaly with three thousand horse withdrew himselfe into his promised gouernment of BOSNA, to possesse himselfe thereof: and being come neere to BAGVALVE, the chiefe towne of that prouince, he there encamped in a faire large medow, within sight of the citie. Now Zeffer Bassa, then Gouernour of the prouince, and not as yet thereof discharged, seeing this rebell thus to encroach vpon his charge, as if he would euen by force intrude himselfe thereinto, with all speed called together his garrisons and men of warre (euer readie at his beck) and so went forth against Zellaly, with a purpose to haue quickly, and without any great trouble, cut him with his so small a companie all in pieces. But the old rebell not ignorant either of his owne weakenesse, or of the Bassaes strength, hauing himselfe lost the best part of his forces before in HVNGARIE (as he was a man of no lesse wisedome than courage) resolued now to attempt by policie that which he well knew he could not by force effect. Wherefore he as a great Prince, vpon some braue resolution, began to encampe himselfe as if he had meant there to haue lyen, when as immediatly after vpon a faire night hauing caused diuers great fires to be made in his tents, as if it had beene to beguile the enemie with, he suddenly rose and departed. Of whose flight (for so it was like) the Bassa vnderstanding, and that he had forsaken his campe, hasted thither with all speed with his souldiors to take and pillage the same; not making any other account of him that was so fled and gone, but as of a base and faint-hearted coward, who for feare & want of courage had left both his camp and honour as a prey vnto his enemies; the spoile wherof the Bassa (being possessed of the camp) gaue vnto his soldiors; who glad of such a morsell, greedily swallowed it vp, which by and by after became their bane & vtter destruction: For whilest that they were charging themselues with booties, & euery man was thinking of his prey, nothing carefull of their common safetie, Zelally with his 3000 horse, all valiant and resolute men, suddenly the same night returning, surprised the Turkes being fast on sleepe, as buried in securitie, and cut them in pieces. Some of greater courage than the rest, began to make head, and to giue some shew of their valour, but ouercome with the generall feare, out of order, and not resolued what to do, they were quickly with the rest forced, ouerthrowne, and slaine. In this surprise there were of the Bassaes men six thousand found dead vpon the place. A very great slaughter to be made by so few men: But what cannot valiant resolution do against carelessenesse, lulled asleepe in the lap of securitie? The Bassa himselfe escaped by flight, with such as could get out of the campe to follow him.

Zelally commeth into Bosna

Now

A Now Zellaly well knowing how to vſe his victorie, marched in haſt to all the chiefe places of the prouince, and with his forces more feared for their victorie than for their number, cauſed all the inhabitants of thoſe places, with moſt part of the reſt of the people of the countrey, to ſweare vnto him their obedience and fidelitie. In which doing he gathered together great ſtore of wealth, with a great number of braue horſes for ſeruice: all which he put into BALNALVC, a ſtrong towne, wherinto he in triumphant manner entred, with a crowne of laurell vpon his head, and his ſouldiors ſinging his praiſes amiddeſt the ſmoke of a thouſand pieces of great ordnance, which he cauſed inceſſantly to be ſhot off for the ſpace of two daies together: giuing it out withall (amongſt all the ioyfull feaſtes and triumphes, made for the
B magnifying and ſetting foorth of his praiſe and glorie) That his reſolution was, to take part with the Chriſtian emperour, if the great Baſſaes, or other his enemies, in great place in court, ſhould ſeeke to croſſe his deſires, or to formalize his actions or proceedings in this maner of the obtaining of his gouernment.

Now Mahomet doubting what this man, ſo well acquainted with rebellion, would do, had by diuers meſſengers ſent for him to CONSTANTINOPLE, after the breaking vp of the armie in HVNGARIE, there of his imperiall and infinit bountie, to receiue the honorable rewards of his good ſeruice and valour, the greatneſſe wherof he had (as he ſaid) alreadie vnderſtood by Haſſan Baſſa the Generall: which ſo bound him to the reward thereof, as that his deſire and pleaſure was, to grace him in court with his own hands, for the greater teſtimony of the loue
C he bare him, and of the eſteeme he had of him. But the craftie and miſtruſtfull rebell, doubting that theſe faire words were all but baits to draw him into his power, to the endangering or aſſured loſſe both of his life and libertie, ſhut his eares againſt theſe ſo ſweet charmes, and as a man well aduiſed, & one which knew that the hand of a prince iuſtly offended, is alwaies open for to puniſh his rebellious ſubiects, being once in his power, with as great iuſtice in puniſhing him, as he with wrong and diſloialtie offended him; would in no wiſe accept of the offer: but ciuilly anſwered, That he moſt humbly thanked the great Sultan, for his ſo great and honorable offers, and that he was ſo mindfull of him: but that he for his part deſired not any greater reward, for the ſeruices by him done, more than the gouernment which his Maieſtie had before promiſed him, whereof (according to which promiſe, which hee could not D thinke, but to be agreeable to his good liking) he was now poſſeſſed, with a reſolution to hold and keepe the ſame for his Maieſties ſeruice. Which was as much in effect, as for a diſloyall ſubiect to talke with his angrie Soueraigne, with his hand vpon his ſword. But with this ſlie anſwer, ſuch as it was, Sultan Mahomet for all his greatneſſe, muſt as yet content himſelfe, for feare leaſt if he ſhould haue ſought to haue by force remoued him, hee might ſo haue raiſed a more dangerous rebellion in EVROPE, than was already in ASIA: Zellaly ſo politique and reſolute a man, and not to ſeek what to do in ſuch matters, being poſſeſſed of ſo great a gouernment, and the Chriſtian emperour at hand ready to haue backed him, if he ſhould vpon any diſcontentment haue reuolted.

The troubles of this yeare 1603 thus ouerpaſt, the beginning of the next was like vnto a 1604
E faire blooming tree, which promiſing great ſtore of fruit, but afterward blaſted with the extremitie of the weather, proueth in effect as barren, as it before ſeemed in hope fruitfull. For beginning with the ſoote Weſterne winds of peace, it ended with the ſterne Northren blaſts of warre. The Turks had oftentimes the laſt yeare made motion of peace, but eſpecially toward the end thereof; outwardly making ſhew of a great deſire and forwardneſſe in themſelues thereunto. Which buſineſſe the laſt yeare begun, was euen with the beginning of this yeare alſo effectually continued, that commiſſioners were on both ſides appointed to con-
F ferre and conclude vpon the ſame. Among theſe commiſſioners Colonell Althem was one, who to performe his charge, hauing taken with him the other commiſſioners deputed with him for this purpoſe, with certaine other captaines, embarqued himſelfe with them in 13 ſhips from STRIGONIVM, and from thence ſailing downe the riuer, landed with his traine in the iſland betwixt BVDA and PESTH. Of whoſe arriuall there the Turkes of BVDA aduertiſed, and on their part readie, came forthwith thither alſo, with all the outward ſhewes that might be, of their moſt earneſt deſire for the concluding of peace: whereas our men, who by a thouſand effects were aſſured of the vnfaithfulneſſe of the Turks, and that neceſſitie, and not the deſire of any quietneſſe, had drawne them to ſeeke for peace, to the contrarie ſhewed themthemſelues verie backward in this buſineſſe. For why, they knew right well, that the Turks had not taken this matter in hand, but to ouertake them, and by this time of peace to gaine a time of war more commodious and fit for their ambitious and cruell deſignes. They had the yeare before made ſufficient proofe of our forces, accompanied with good fortune, which cauſed them to deſpaire by ſtrong hand to vanquiſh and ouercome vs: beſides that they ſtill euerie houre in one place or other receiued a thouſand loſſes and croſſes from our garriſons; who diſtreſſed & anoyed them both with their forces, and with driuing of them vnto the extremitie of wants. Our men knew moreouer alſo, that the troubles of Asia as well from the rebels as from the Perſian which lay ſo heauie vpon the great Sultan, drew them to this neceſſitie, to ſeeke for a breathing time of peace, wherein to repaire that which was in their forces and ſtrength by wars impaired. And euen yet alſo the manner of the Turks demeaning of themſelues in this action, their delayes, their excuſes, & deferring from day to day to cõclude vpon ſome point of this treatie, gaue our men good cauſe to ſuſpect them of euill meaning, as men reſpecting their profit, more than their faith: and more ſubtil & cruell in all their actions, than honorable and valorous. The fift of Ianuary was the day by our men expected for the treaty, for as then the Baſſa of Buda had appointed with the reſt of the cõmiſſioners to come into the iſle, to heare what our commiſſioners ſhould demand, and to entreat of the peace. But he was too true an infidel to faile of his infidelitie, and ſo came not at all, but deceiued our men both of their hope and expectation. At length, in ſtead of himſelfe, letters were brought from him to colonell Althem, wherby he excuſed himſelfe for not comming; requeſting him with the reſt of the commiſſioners, to come ouer the riuer to Buda, the more commodiouſly for them to confer together, & ſo the better to conclude their negotiation. Now though Althem for the maieſtie of his prince, and the honor of the ſtate, ought not at the requeſt of theſe his enemies to haue put himſelfe into their power, but to haue ſtood faſt vpon the tearms of honor, yet to the end that the countrey of Hungarie, ſo miſerably ſpoiled with wars, ſhould not take occaſion to complaine of his negligence in this negotiation of peace, he reſolued to go to Buda, as the Baſſa had requeſted: deeming euery action tending to the hinderance of the common good, to be but in ſhew honourable, and indeed hurtfull. Vpon which reſolution he ſent before the gentleman of his ſtable, and his cooke, with a gentleman of the Turks, ſent but the day before from the Baſſa: which men going aboord together, were aſſailed with ſuch a cruell tempeſt vpon the riuer, that neither the skill of the watermen, nor goodneſſe of the veſſell, was able to reſiſt the force therof, ſo that the boat was ſunke, & the men drowned. An euil preſage of the peace to be made, the raging waters as it were foreſhewing the troubles to come. But this tempeſt by the ſacrifice of theſe poore drowned men appeaſed, Althem and Geisberg, two of the chiefe commiſſioners, embarqued themſelues, & ſo paſſed ouer the riuer to Buda. At whoſe arriuall the Turkes gaue, in ſhew, a thouſand teſtimonies of their ioy for their comming. Neither did the Germans refuſe their kind offered courteſies, but largely fed of the good cheere, and filled themſelues with the good wines, whereof the Turks had giuen them plentie: and they again vſing them as kindly, as if they had been their brethren, and conuerſing with them as with their own countreymen. Amiddeſt this carowſing and platters full of good cheere, the propoſition of peace, which the Turkes meant to demand, were ſerued in alſo, and a truce for 12 dayes demaunded to conſider of the matter: during which time it ſhould be lawfull for euery man without let freely to come & go whither they would: which was forthwith on both ſides agreed vpon. And for better teſtimonie of the Turks true meaning in this their negotiation of peace, the Baſſa in the preſence of our commiſſioners diſpatched a courrour toward the great Sultan, to aduertiſe him of this buſineſſe, & of the proceeding therein, according to the commaundement by him before giuen. Which he did, to cauſe our men to beleeue, that the great Sultan himſelfe was deſirous of peace, and that his captaines well affected thereunto, were willing to further the ſame. Which done, the Baſſa preſented vnto colonell Althem two caſes full of Turks armes, of all manner of faſhions, verie rich, and cunningly wrought; both carried by a mule, with furniture for an horſe, embroydered with gold and pearle, verie ſumptuous and rich, as a preſent from the great Sultan, his Lord and Maſter, to the Emperour. And for the Archduke Matthias, hee preſented vnto the colonell, a robe of purple veluet, with ſleeues cunningly embroydered with gold and pearle, emboſſed with fine and curions figures, cunningly wrought with the needle: for

The Baſſa of Buda faileth to meet the Chriſtian commiſſioners according to his promiſe.

An euill preſage of the future peace.

The Chriſtian commiſſioners courteouſly entertained at Buda.

A truce for twelue daies agreed vponbe twixt the Turks and the Chriſtians.

Preſents by the Turkes giuen to the Chriſtian commiſſioners.

A for the rareneſſe therof as adminable to behold,as for the richneſſe thereof to haue been deſired: which was by euery man wondred at,when as ſhortly after it was by Althem preſented vnto the Archduke,together with other preſents from the Turks. Beſides that,the ſame Baſſa,in token of friendſhip,preſented vnto Althem himſelfe another very faire and rich robe:all the reſt of the commiſſioners receiuing alſo from the Baſſa other robes of leſſe value, but yet all verie rich and ſumptuous.

This buſineſſe for this time thus ended,and the truce for twelue daies concluded,the Chriſtian commiſſioners loaded with preſents,tooke their leaue of the Turkes, with the ſhewes of their good wils,and ſo returned backe againe to PESTH. Howbeit theſe the enemies faire preſents,ſtill ſauoured but of enmitie, being indeed but like to the preſents of Hector and Aiax,
B tending rather to war,than to peace.

Now the death of the moſt valiant and renowmed lord Nadaſti, which at this time happened,was another euill preſage of the bad ſucceſſe of this treatie of peace now at hand: who hauing of long been a barre vnto the Turks rage in that part of HVNGARIE where he dwelt, they now after his death with the violence of their forces, as with an headie ſtreame, bare downe before them all our good fortune in that prouince. This worthie man of great fame and deſert,had ſpent both his yeares and fortunes in the moſt honourable warres againſt the Turks: wherein he was ſo skilfull and expert,that he was of them feared as another Huniades: and of the Chriſtians honoured,as another Matthias. He had a thouſand times moſt valiantly fought againſt theſe miſcreants,and as many times foiled them, to the great benefit of the C Chriſtian commonweale,the aduancement of the emperours ſeruice,and the reliefe of his diſtreſſed countrey. Theſe his heroicall deeds of armes, were engrauen vpon the gates of the townes and cities of HVNGARIE,and within the rockes of TRANSYLVANIA,hauing both in the one countrey and the other,right happily defeated theſe infidels. He had the honour to haue receiued the firſt incurſions and attempts of the Turks,at ſuch time as Amurath the third hauing perfidiouſly broken the league made with Maximilian the emperor,with his forces inuaded HVNGARIE: and was the firſt of all the Chriſtian chiefetaines that made head againſt them; and being by their ſudden comming in,by them almoſt ſurpriſed,performed yet great and worthie exploits and ſeruice againſt theſe faithleſſe men. It ſhould ſeeme that good fortune fauoured the countrey of HVNGARIE but onely in reſpect of him: for he being dead,
D it died alſo,burying it ſelfe as it were in his graue, and him in glory,not ſuffring him to grow old,and ſo to languiſh in the ruines of his natiue countrey. He died of a naturall death about fiftie and foure yeares old,moſt part wherof he liued in armes, ſtill charged with the burthen of his armour, and euen at the yeelding vp of the ghoſt yet breathing wars againſt theſe the enemies of the Chriſtian faith. His death was much lamented for of many faithfull Chriſtians,but eſpecially of his own tenants and ſubiects,whom he had alwaies kept and preſerued in ſafetie,and ſtill maintained them in all peace and tranquilitie,during all theſe former wars, the Turkes not daring once to aſſaile them,nor to enter into their territorie; being ſtaid from ſo doing by the bulwarke of his valour,right dreadfull to their attempts. Neuer Turke was buried in his territorie, no more than were the Barbarians vpon the bankes of the riuer Eu-
E rotas,his wiſdom had ſo wiſely prouided for the preſeruation of his people;and his valour ſo worthily aſſured them of their health & ſafetie. He was for his country another Epiminondas who made his towne not onely free from the armes and inuaſions of their enemies, but alſo dreadfull to their forces ſo long as he liued. The Turks on the contrarie part no leſſe reioyced for his death;but accounting his country now rich and plentiful(for that it had neuer bin by them ſpoiled) for their moſt aſſured prey, came now thither on all ſides,to haue taken the ſpoile therof,and therewith to haue enriched themſelues. But as they were about ſo to haue done,the valiant Collonitz honoring the remembrance of the lord Nadaſti,his late fellow and companion in armes,and holding that for his own which he had left,oppoſed himſelfe with his forces againſt theſe rauening wolues. So that they were no ſooner entred into this his ter-
F ritory,but that,contrary to their expectation,they were encountred by this new Nadaſti,and by him ſo ouerthrowne and cut in pieces, that for a good while after they durſt no more attempt the like.

The true and iuſt commendation of the lord Nadaſti.

This ſo great a loſſe of ſo worthie a man, was a little eaſed by the victorie about the ſame time gained by the Vayuod of VALACHIA againſt the Turks,ſpoyling of his countrey. This valiant

valiant champion not able longer to endure the proud insolencie and tyranny of those barbarour people, gathered together his troups of horsemen, with such other small forces as he had, wherof the Turks hauing made small reckoning, and therefore without order pillaging and ransacking his countrey, were when they least feared, by him vpon the sudden surprised and ouerthrowne, many of them being cut in pieces, a number moe taken prisoners, with all the spoils they had got, and the rest with such feare chased out of his country, as that being glad to haue escaped, they tooke no pleasure for a great while after, to looke into that his prouince againe. G

But to returne againe to the Commissioners for the peace to bee made betwixt the great Sultan and the Emperour, the Bassa of BVDA, to the end that the captaines and gouernors of the Turkes and castles belonging to the Turkes, being ignorant of the truce, should not continue their warlike actions, to the preiudice of his faith giuen, (immediately after the departure of the Christian commissioners from BVDA) dispatched diuers courrours towards them, to giue them knowledge thereof, and especially to the Gouernour of AGRIA, commaunding them from thenceforth to abstaine from their ordinarie incursions into their enemies territories, and from all other actions of hostilitie, and so to keepe themselues quiet, vntill they were from him otherwise commaunded. This little time of respite and breathing from warre, gaue great contentment vnto the poore countrey people, now with wars almost exhausted and spent. And now our souldiors during this time of truce laying their armes aside, ran by heaps with spades and shouels, vnto the places where our armies had sometime lyen encamped, there to delue and search to find such things as the armies rising in hast had haply left there buried. In which action they so busied themselues, as if they had been labourers in harueſt, so that nothing was in the fields to be seene, but men digging and remoning of stones and earth. A right fooliſh businesse, and yet so exceedingly pleasing the greedy minds of these couetous men, as that amiddest their such moiling labor, they accounted themselues at great ease. The Turks did the like also, mingled together with our men, and our men with them, without any iniurie doing one to another, either by word or deed. And no doubt it is, but that there they found more trauell than wealth, the greedie desire which drew them into this worke, deceiuing them in effect. And in this madde labour both the parties spent many daies without any let or iniurie doing, either on the one side or the other. The Christians of PESTH also passing ouer the Danubie, went into the victualling houses of the Turks at BVDA, whereinto they were suffered to enter, and at libertie to walke vp and down the town at their pleasure. And so the Turks of BVDA likewise came ouer the riuer vnto PESTH, and there walked at their pleasure, no man letting of them. Which manner of liuing was verie commodious and pleasing both for the one side and the other, the Christians buying of the Turks such things as they needed, and the Turks of them likewise. Through which quiet and peaceable intercourse and traffique, the people in generall, seemed euen in that short time, to haue forgotten a great part of their forepassed miseries, this little time of peace, ioyned with securitie hauing well assuaged the same. But while these mutuall and vnwonted courtesies thus passed betwixt the Christians and the Turks, and the minds of most men were filled with the expectation of an assured peace to haue bin euen forthwith concluded, the great Sultan Mahomet in the middest of all his pleasures and delights, died in his imperiall palace at CONSTANTINOPLE: the newes whereof being in the euening brought to BVDA, by a courrour of purpose sent from CONSTANTINOPLE, the Bassa forthwith sent the captain of the sentinels of BVDA, to Colonell Geisberg at PESTH, to assure him of the death of the great Sultan Mahomet, and of the succession of his young sonne Achmat into his empire, now already both at CONSTANTINOPLE, and other places therabout proclaimed Emperor. By which messenger he also wrote vnto colonell Althem, to certifie him both of the death of the great Sultan, and of the succession of his sonne, as also that he was by him commaunded to continue the negotiation of the peace, and so if he could to conclude the same. For the more euidence whereof, behold the copie of the letters themselues.

The small time of truce yeldeth great contentment both vnto the Christians and Turkes in Hungarie.

The death of the great Sultan Mahomet.

H I K L M

The letters of the Bassa of Buda to Colonell Althem.

Our due commendations remembred, noble Lo. Gouernour, our deere friend, and right honourable neighbour,

A neighbour, Wee haue thought good to aduertiſe you, that the fourth day after your departure from this city wee receiued letters from CONSTANTINOPLE, giuing vs certainly to vnderſtand of the death of our moſt mightie Emperour Mahomet, and of the ſucceſſion of his ſonne Sultan Achmat, into all his dominions and empires: whereby we were, as his moſt humble ſubiects, ſummoned to yeeld vnto him, our oath of faithfull obedience, as vnto our rightfull lord, and lawfull ſucceſſor of his father into all his eſtates and dominions. Moreouer, hee particularly commandeth vs, to giue him certaine aduice and knowledge concerning the negotiation of the peace begun betwixt vs and you, by the commandement of his deceaſed father: promiſing to confirme and ratifie all that whatſoeuer he ſhall find done and agreed vpon concerning that buſineſſe, without any qualification at all. And that if the treatie bee not yet concluded and en-
B ded, that his will and deſire was, that it ſhould be ſo, according to the iuſt meanes and aſſurances, that wee ſhould faithfully and carefully together deuiſe. Whereof I ſhould readily giue him aduice and anſwer, which I haue deferred to do, vntill I haue receiued your anſwer, which may inſtruct me what to reſolue vpon. Which your anſwer I attending, haue ſtaied the courrour of CONSTANTINOPLE, to the intent he may carrie backe word vnto our Emperour, what he is to hope for concerning this buſineſſe, by the anſwer that you ſhall giue vs. Theſe are now therefore to aduize you, as our deere friend, and a moſt valiant Gouernour, to ſet downe that which you ſhall thinke to be moſt fit and neceſſarie in this buſineſſe: giuing you withall to vnderſtand, that our new Emperour is a man of reſolution euen in theſe his young yeares, wherein hee now flouriſheth, hating idleneſſe, deeming no loſſe greater, and altogether irrepa-
C rable, than the loſſe of time. If then you be ſtill deſirous, that the peace betwixt our Emperours ſhould be made and confirmed, I hope you will employ your whole endeuour with ſpeed to determine this moſt happie negotiation, and ſo neceſſarie for euery mans good. As alſo to auert farre from our owne heads, the curſes of the common people, for whom it is moſt needfull that the peace ſhould for their good and quietneſſe be concluded, ſeeing that the fruit thereof is expected to be vnto them happie, and the glorie thereof for euer ours, for hauing by our diligence and true endeuour concluded the ſame. Which maketh me to hope, that when you ſhall find your ſelfe readie to conclude this treatie, you will not bring with you men enemies vnto peace, or ſuch as ſhall diſſwade the ſame: but rather wiſe and graue men, which to the vttermoſt of their power may aduance the ſame; and find out good and reaſonable meanes to aſſure an eternall and faithfull peace betwixt our Emperours, vnto which ſo generall a good euery one of vs is in D duetie bound to imploy the vttermoſt of his ſufficiencie and power. And this is that I haue of truth to write vnto you at this time. And ſo I bid you farewell.

Now theſe letters although they moſt concerned the continuation of the treatie of peace, alreadie begun, and were too friendly from an enemie, to haue in them any good meaning, yet did they well aſſure the colonell, to whom they were written, of the death of the great and late Sultan Mahomet, and of the ſucceſſion of his ſonne Achmat into his Empire, to which end they are here ſet downe.

This late mightie Monarch, and now nothing but a loathſome lump of dead fleſh, the great Sultan Mahomet departed this life about the later end of Ianuarie, in the yeare of grace 1604 (according to their computation which begin the yeare at Chriſtmas) when hee had liued a-E bout 44 yeares, and thereof raigned eight. He was a man of no great ſpirit, and yet exceeding proud, which was the cauſe, that hee was both the leſſe beloued and feared of his ſubiects in generall, but eſpecially of the Ianizaries and other his ſouldiours and men of warre, who ſcorning his looſe gouernment, and grieued to ſee euen the greateſt affaires of ſtate not onely imparted to women, but by them mannaged and ouerruled alſo (as by his mother, the Sultaneſſe his wife, and others) not onely rebelled againſt him, but were ofttimes in their rages about to haue depoſed him. He was altogether giuen to ſenſualitie and voluptuous pleaſure, the marks whereof he ſtill carried about with him, a foule, ſwolne, vnweldie, and ouergrowne bodie, vnfit for any princely office or function: and a mind thereto anſwerable, wholly giuen ouer vnto idleneſſe, pleaſure, and exceſſe, no ſmall meanes for the ſhortening of his dayes, which he ended
F with obloquie, vnregarded of his ſubiects, and but of few or none of them lamented.

Mahomet, why he was not regarded of his men of warre.

He had iſſue foure ſonnes, and three daughters maried vnto three of the great Baſſaes.

Mahomet his iſſue.

His firſt and eldeſt ſonne was called Mahomet (after his owne name) whom hee cauſed to bee ſtrangled in his owne ſight, vpon ſuſpition of aſpiring to the Empire, and conſpiring with the rebels in ASIA: but afterward finding him guiltleſſe, cauſed his bodie to be buried in his own ſepulchre, and hanged the Baſſa that had miſinformed him.

His

His ſecond ſonne died a naturall death, being yet verie young. G

His third ſonne was Sultan Achmat, who ſucceeded his father, and came to the empire by the vntimely death of Mahomet his eldeſt brother.

His fourth ſonne being then a youth of about ſixteene yeares old, was carefully kept within the Seraglio, with ſuch a ſtrait guard ſet ouer him, as that his name was not to bee learned, euen by a good vnderſtanding friend of mine, of late lying aboue three moneths together at CONSTANTINOPLE, who moſt curiouſly enquired after the ſame, hauing verie good meanes to haue learned it. He was reported to haue been long ſince murthered, howbeit that hee of late liued, but looking euery day to be by his brothers cruell commandement ſtrangled, which is accounted but a matter of courſe, and a death hereditarie to all the younger male children of the Othoman Emperours: the policie for the maintenance of their great empire entire and whole, ſo H requiring.

Mahomet, how he lieth buried at Conſtãtinople

His dead bodie lyeth buried at CONSTANTINOPLE, in a faire chappell of white marble (neere vnto the moſt famous and beautifull church of S. Sophia) for that onely purpoſe by himſelfe moſt ſumptuouſly built about fiftie foot ſquare, with foure high ſmall round towers, about the which are certaine ſmall round galleries of ſtone: from which the Turkiſh prieſtes and church-men, at certaine houres, vſe to call the people euery day to church: For they vſe no bels themſelues, neither will they ſuffer the Chriſtians to vſe any. But the top of this chappell is built round, like vnto the auncient Temples of the Heathen gods in ROME. In the middeſt of this chappell (being indeed nothing elſe but this great Sultans ſepulchre) ſtandeth his tombe, which is nothing elſe but a great vrne or coffin of faire white marble, wherein lyeth his bodie, couered I with a great couering of the ſame ſtone ouer it, made riſing in the middeſt, and ſtooping on each ſide: not much vnlike to the coffins of the auncient tombes of the Saxon kings, which are to be ſeene on the North ſide of the quire of S. Pauls Church, and in other places of this land: but that this coffin of the great Sultan is much greater and more ſtately than are thoſe of the Saxon kings; it being aboue fiue foot high at the end thereof, and by little and little falling toward the feet, couered with a rich hearſe of cloth of gold downe to the ground: his turbant ſtanding at his head, and two exceeding great candles of white waxe, about three or foure yards long, ſtanding in great braſſe or ſiluer candleſtickes guilded, the one at his head, the other at his feet, which neuer burne, but there ſtand for ſhew onely. All the floare of the chappell being couered with matts, and faire Turkie carpets vpon them. And round about this his toombe, euen K in the ſame chappell, are the like toombes for his wiues and children, but nothing ſo great and faire. Into this chappell, or any other the Turks churches or chappels, it is not lawfull for either Turke or Chriſtian to enter, but firſt hee muſt put off his ſhoocs, leauing them at the church or chappell gate, or carrying them in his hand. Neere vnto this chappell, and the great temple of Sophia, are diuers other chappels of the other great Turks, as of Sultan Selim, this mans grandfather, with his ſeuen and thirtie children about him: of Sultan Amurath, this mans father, with his fiue and fortie children entombed about him. And in other places not farre from them, are the chappels and ſepulchres of the reſt of the great Sultans, as of Sultan Mahomet the Great, of Sultan Baiazet, Sultan Selym the firſt, Sultan Solyman: all by theſe great Mahometane emperours built, whoſe names they beare. And being all of almoſt one forme and faſhion, haue eue- L rie one of them a faire hoſpitall adioyning vnto them, wherein a great multitude of poore people are daily ſtill relieued.

Some others of the great Baſſaes haue their chappels and ſepulchres, with their great and ſtately almes-houſes alſo, not much inferiour vnto thoſe of the great Sultans; as namely Ibrahim Baſſa, of all the Baſſaes that euer were among the Turkes the moſt magnificent, hath his ſtately chappell, ſepulchre, and almes-houſes, neere both in place and beautie, vnto that of Solymans. The Turkes burie not at all within their churches, neither are any at all buried within the walles of the citie, but the great Turkiſh Emperours themſelues, with their wiues and children about them, and ſome few other of their great Baſſaes, and thoſe onely in chappels by themſelues built for that purpoſe. All the reſt of the Turks are buried in the fields; ſome of the better ſort in tombes of marble; but the reſt with tombe ſtones laid vpon them, or with two M great ſtones, the one ſet vp at the head, and the other at the feet of euerie graue, the greateſt part of them being of white marble, brought from the iſle of MARMORA. They will not burie any man where another hath beene buried, accounting it impietie to digge vp another mans bones.

A bones. By reaſon whereof they couer all the beſt ground about the citie with ſuch great white ſtones. which for the infinite number of them, are thought ſufficient to make another wall about the citie. But not to ſtand longer vpon the maner of the Turks burials, leauing this great Sultan to reſt with his anceſtors, let vs now proſecute the courſe of our hiſtorie.

THE LIFE OF ACHMAT, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, EIGHT EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES.

MAhomet the late Sultan in the middeſt of his exceſſiue pleaſures by vntimely death taken away, Achmat, the elder of his two ſonnes yet liuing, who was to ſucceed him in the empire, to preuent the vſuall and inſolent tumults of the Ianizaries and other ſouldiors of the court at the change of the Emperours, and to take from them all occaſions of diſcontentment, by the counſell of the great Baſſes (before he tooke vpon him the gouernment) cauſed an exceeding great ſumme of mony (viz. two millions and an halfe) as a token of his bountie, to be diſtributed amongſt them: the Spahi and Silictars his chiefe horſemen receiuing thereof 10 crowns a man, with 5 aſpers a day more to encreaſe their pay; and the Ianizaries 30 crowns a man, and one aſper a day more of ordinarie pay: they of his court, but eſpecially the chiefe officers, taſting of this his bounteous liberalitie alſo. With which ſo great a larges, all men wel contented, he in a moſt rich & ſtately chariot, ſo placed as that all men might well ſee him, was in great maieſtie caried through all the chief ſtreets of CONSTANTINOPLE, the people on euery ſide gazing vpon him, & ſtil as he paſſed by them, proſecuting him with their moſt ioyful and happie acclamations. Some wiſhing that he being but yong, might as another Solyman begin his raigne with the conqueſt of MALTA, as had the other with the conqueſt of the RHODES: and other ſome as heartily praying that with glorious and victorious conqueſts he might be like vnto Mahomet the Great, whom he was then reported much to reſemble. In which ſo great and publique magnificence, he being about 15 yeres old, was with all the accuſtomed ſolemnities openly crowned, euery man wiſhing vnto him a moſt long and happie raigne. And albeit that no great fruit was for the preſent from ſo young and tender a plant to bee expected, yet neuertheleſſe by his authoritie and in his name, many good orders were taken for the reliefe of his ſubiects, with moſt heauie grieuances generally oppreſſed, duting the looſe and careleſſe raigne of his father. His grandmother alſo a moſt proud, ambitious, and imperious woman, & withall exceeding rich, who with great authoritie at her pleaſure ouerruled all in the time of the raigne of her ſonne Mahomet, he now remoued from the ſtate, as not fit for her to haue to doe therein, and ſo depriued her of all her former power and commaund. The Perſian embaſſadour, whom his father in his diſpleaſure had cloſe ſhut vp, he ſet at libertie, and with him ſent the Baſſa of ALEPPO to intreat of peace with the great Shaugh of PERSIA, who not long before (as was reported) had recouered the great citie of TAVRIS, and was then preparing himſelfe for new conqueſts. Which report for the motion of peace with the Perſian, diſcouered in his ſubiects their diuers opinions concerning him ſelfe; ſome condemning his patience, as not beſeeming the Othoman Emperours, vnto whom furie and rage had alwaies made them a way vnto their great and dreadfull conqueſts euen againſt the moſt puiſſant armies and ſtrongeſt townes and fortreſſes of their enemies: and ſome other to the contrarie praiſing therein his wiſedome, in ſeeking by faire meanes (now in the beginning of his raigne) to diſarme his enemies when they might moſt hurt him, at his better opportunitie, in his ſetled eſtate, to oppreſſe them,

The treatie for peace alſo in HVNGARIE was notwithſtanding the death of Mahomet, by the Baſſa of BVDA ſtill continued, who (as hee ſaid) by the new Sultan authorized, by letters incited the Gouernour of STRIGONIVM to repaire vnto ſome ſuch conuenient place as wherein the matter might be ſafely concluded. Vpon which motion the Gouernour with the reſt of the Commiſſioners departing from STRIGONIVM, the fourth of Februarie came to Collonitz his campe, from whence they were by the ſouldiours moſt brauely conducted along the banks of Danubius, vnto the ſhips which lay readie for them, to carie them downe the riuer to PESTH: during which time of their paſſage nothing was to be ſeene or heard but fire and ſmoke, and the thundering of the great artillerie both from PESTH and BVDA, the Chriſtians and the Turkes both ſtriuing to excell each other in theſe their ſhewes of ioy and triumph. The Gouernour with the reſt of his companie being happily arriued at PESTH, met there with a number of the better ſort of the Turkes ſent thither by the Baſſa to meet him, and in his name to greet him: who with a thouſand honours againe receiued and ſaluted them. All ſhewes of kindneſſe, and ſignes of the happie ſucceſſe of the negotiation begun. And now the Chriſtians deſirous to excell the Turks, as well in courteſie as in valour, appointed a number of them the next day to goe to BVDA, to inuite certaine of the chiefeſt and moſt honourable men amongſt the Turks, vnto a banquet at PESTH: Who willingly accepted of the offer, and ſo came ſix hundred of the better ſort of them ouer the Danubie to PESTH, where the feaſt was moſt ſumptuouſly and magnificently prepared for them. There were tenne faire and rich pauillions, ſet vp for the entertainment of them a little diſtant from PESTH, in a faire place, and fit for this purpoſe. In the firſt whereof were placed three verie proud and ſtately tables. At the firſt of which tables, on the right hand, were ſet the Commiſſioners for the Emperour, with the two Baſſaes, and one Muftie, or Archprieſt, with a myter vpon his head, a long furred gowne vpon his backe, and vnder that a robe of moſt fine and exceeding rich ſilke. Vpon the left hand, at the ſame table were placed certaine of the Turkes lords, and other great men. At the other two tables were ſet other of the beſt ſort of the Turkes mingled with the Chriſtians: and ſo at all the other tables in like order were ſet a Chriſtian and a Turke, vntill that the ſix hundred Turkes were placed, with as many Chriſtians among them, who by their good countenance and behauiour one of them to another, might haue ſeemed to haue beene all of one and the ſame beliefe, nation, and countrie. The Turkes after the manner of their ſuperſtition, would not ſit downe before the ſetting of the Sunne, which being ſet, they with a thouſand ceremonies, to the imitation of their Archprieſt, ſet themſelues downe at the tables in order as is aforeſaid, and there merrily repoſed themſelues vntill nine of the clocke at night. At which time the tables with great reuerence taken away, the Turkes as men well contented and full of ioy, returned to BVDA, the inſtruments of muſicke, trumpets, and drummes, on euerie ſide ſounding about them with much glee, and as it were witneſſing vnto heauen and earth the great contentment they had receiued. And yet was all this faire ſhew nothing elſe but deepe diſſimulation mixt with moſt foule treacherie. For a little before their departure, they of PESTH were aduertiſed, That the Turkes in great number well appointed, were come out from BVDA to ſurpriſe PESTH, during the time of the feaſt, being in hope that the Chriſtians all buſied in this action, had left the walles of the towne vnfurniſhed of defence. But they too well acquainted with their treacheries, to put any truſt or confidence in their faire ſhewes, had as well prouided for the defence and ſafetie of the towne, as for the magnificence of the feaſt abroad. By which meanes the Turkes diſappointed of their intended purpoſe, were in the attempting thereof repulſed, and ſo glad to returne as they came backe againe to BVDA. H I K L

The next day after the Commiſſioners for the Emperour complained vnto the Baſſa and the reſt of the Turkes Commiſſioners, of this ſo treacherous dealing: who excuſed themſelues as altogether ignorant thereof, diſauowing the action for want of ſucceſſe, which had it beene effected, they would to the vttermoſt haue ſhamefully maintained. courſe

A course among the great, with speech and countenance in shew to condemne that for want of effect, which they in heart and mind could for their owne profit haue wished to haue been performed.

Neuertheleſſe the Turkes the next day (as if no ſuch thing had beene meant) requeſted the Chriſtian Commiſſioners to come to BVDA, as they had done to PESTH: but they as well by proofe as by report perceiuing the euill meaning of the Turks, excuſing themſelues, returned to STRIGONIVM, as loth any more to aduenture themſelues into the power of their faithleſſe enemies; yet left they Geisberg at PESTH, with commiſſion to continue the negotiation for peace with the Baſſa of BVDA, if he ſhould find him therunto diſpoſed, or any hope of bringing the treatie to good effect or iſſue. The Commiſſioners for the emperor refuſe any more to goe to Buda.

B Mahomet the late Sultan had a little before his death (as is before declared) ſet at libertie the Countie Iſolan (carried away priſoner to CONSTANTINOPLE after the taking of ALBA REGALIS) and ſent him with letters of credence to entreat of a peace to bee made with the Emperour, with promiſe to yeeld himſelfe againe priſoner, if he failed to obtaine the ſame; for whom the French Embaſſadour became pledge. He hauing now deliuered his letters of credence vnto the Emperour, and commaunded to ſay what hee had further in charge, declared, That the Great Sultan offered to deliuer vnto his Maieſtie the ſtrong townes of BVDA, ALBA REGALIS, and CANISIA, in exchange of TRANSYLVANIA and VALACHIA, whereunto hee layed claime, promiſing on his part to make a moſt firme and ſure peace with the Emperour for the time to come, and to giue thereof ſuch aſſurance as ſhould of him reaſonably bee demaunded. The meſſage of Countie Iſolan from the great Sultan to the Emperour.

C The Baſſa of BVDA alſo amongſt other the faire remonſtrances of peace, had offered vnto the Emperours Commiſſioners to reſtore CANISIA and AGRIA for PESTH, HATVVAN, and VACIA, together with the remiſſion of all ſuch payments and tributes as were by the Emperour due vnto the Great Sultan for the kingdome of HVNGARIE. All which faire ſhewes and offers, though much vnreaſonable, were nothing but windie words to delay the time, and ſubtill baits to deceiue the Chriſtians: for the euent and iſſue, which giueth life to all actions, with a forme vnto them agreeable, hath by experience taught the Chriſtians, That all the glorious and glozing proceedings of the Turkes in this buſineſſe of the peace, ſo much wiſhed and expected of the Chriſtians, were but netts and ſnares wherewith to entangle them with the vaine hope thereof, vntill that they in the meane time The Turks in all the negotiation for peace did nothing but diſſemble with the Emperors Commiſſioners.

D might fortifie their townes with new ſupplies of men, munition, victuals, and whatſoeuer elſe was needfull, the more eaſily afterward to annoy them at their pleaſure, and ſo to laugh at their ſimplicitie and light beliefe: For Mahomet being dead, and Achmat his ſonne (yet by reaſon of his minoritie vnder the tuition of his mother and other the great Baſſaes) ſucceeding in his place, the Turks aggrauated the conditions of the peace, and propounded them ſo farre from reaſon, as that any man might ſee them now to haue no more deſire or regard of peace, after that they had diſpatched that for which they ſeemed before deſirous thereof; inſomuch, that they ſent a meſſenger in poſt from CONSTANTINOPLE vnto the Baſſa of BVDA, to forbid him vpon the paine of his head any further to continue the treatie of peace, but forthwith to renew the warre. So this peace ſo much expected, and now of the people generally hol-

E den for as good as concluded, ſuddainely vaniſhed into ſmoake, nothing remaining of that bodie, compoſed of ſo many wiſhes, more than a vaine expectation, now diſperſed with the wind of the Turkiſh treacherie. And yet during the time of this negotiation for peace ſought for by the Turks both by often letters and meſſengers, many a ſolemne oath had paſſed both from the Sultan Mahomet, and from the Viſier Baſſa for their faithfull and ſincere dealing in the treatie thereof, as, By the God of heauen and earth, By the bookes of Moyſes, By the Pſalmes of Dauid, and By the holy Euangeliſts, oathes much vſed of Turkes, and reſerued for their greateſt ſolemnities, and ſtrongeſt aſſurances of their leagues and promiſes: all which for all that hauing ſerued but as baits and traines to beguile the ſimple and well meaning men, lay now neglected and vnregarded: ſuch is the faith and aſſurance which men haue from faithleſſe and The Treatie for peace with the Turks commeth to nothing.

F vntruſtie men.

The treatie of peace thus broken off, it was foorthwith by ſome bruited, That Achmat the great Sultan, vnder the conduct of the Viſier Baſſa his Gouernor, was himſelfe in perſon with a moſt huge armie about to come into HVNGARIE: Some others in the meane time reporting, that he was letted ſo to do by reaſon of the Perſian warres, wherunto he was of neceſſitie Diuers reports concerning the Turkes great preparations and deſignes.

to ſend the greateſt part of his forces: ſo that he would but only ſend one of his great Baſſaes G with the remainder of his ſo great an armie againſt the Chriſtians in HVNGARIE, being before ſworne neuer to returne againe vnto CONSTANTINOPLE, vntill he had brought the countries of TRANSYLVANIA and VALACHIA, with the remainder of HVNGARIE, vnder the obeyſance of the great Sultan, together with the countrey of AVSTRIA, and eſpecially the ſtrong citie of VIENNA, the end of the Turkiſh Emperours conqueſts: and that to this purpoſe the grand Seignior had with great rigor in all places leuied great ſummes of mony vpon his ſub-iects for the maintenance of his ſo great an armie. It was by others reported alſo, That onely the preparations for ſo great an armie ſhould be made this yeare, the Turkes being reſolued to do much therewith the next yeare, and therefore willing to beſtow much, in hope with ſo great and puiſſant an armie as they were about to rayſe, to make an end of the warres in H HVNGARIE, and not to returne vntill they had conquered all the reſt of that kingdome, in the rent relliques whereof the fortune of the Othoman Emperours had ſtayed: ſo that all handy-crafts men were ſet to worke by day and night not onely to forge weapons, to caſt great ordnance, and to make pouder, but prepare all other things neceſſary alſo for ſo great an exploit.

All theſe great preparations were made for the ſeruice of the Viſier Baſſa for the warre in HVNGARIE, and of Cicala Baſſa in PERSIA, whereof he was appointed Generall, hauing before perſumptuouſly promiſed vtterly to ruinate the Perſians eſtate, and with ſo great a pow-Babylon reported to haue been taken by the Perſian king. er euen to ſwallow him vp. And indeed theſe Eaſterne warres greatly troubled the Turkes; newes comming ſtill concerning the conqueſts of the Perſian vpon his territories; and that I euen of late the Perſian king proſecuting his victories, had taken BABYLON, with all the countrey thereabout: and that diuers other townes and cites, more mooued with feare then with the faith wherewith they had bound themſelues vnto the Turks, now yeelded themſelues vnto the Perſian, as wearie of the Turks ſeruitude, and deſirous of their auncient libertie. And yet for all that, the Turks (as they are wiſe to diſſemble their loſſes, and to ſtrike a feare into The Turks wiſely diſſemble their loſſes. their enemies) had giuen it out in CONSTANTINOPLE, That the Perſian king was neere vnto BABYLON diſcomfited, all his armie ouerthrowne, and he himſelfe taken priſoner; ſo that the Turkes forces before diſtracted ſhould now wholly ioyne togther, to the vtter ruine and deſtruction of the Chriſtians in HVNGARIE. And the more to confirme this euill newes, it was reported, That the Beglerbeg of GRECIA had raiſed a great power to ioyne with the K Viſier Baſſa his forces, to the intent to leaue nothing vnconquered in HVNGARIE. For the better effecting whereof it was ſaid alſo, That the Viſier Baſſa had cauſed a great number of veſſels loded with pouder and other warlike prouiſion to be brought by water out of ÆGYPT to BELGRADE, to ruinate the eſtate of the Chriſtians. All which reports were by the Turkes giuen out, to couer their owne miſhaps, and to terrifie their enemies: as knowing right well, warres to depend much vpon reports, and that a falſe bruit beleeued, worketh oft times the effect of a thing in deed done. Howſoeuer it was, thoſe ſo dreadfull reports might well haue ſerued to haue ſtirred vp the ſpirits of the Chriſtians to haue prouided for their owne defence, and to haue ſtood vpon their guard: For hee that faileth to prouide againſt the preparations of his enemie, well deſerueth either bondage or death, which ſoeuer ſhall befall L him, for hauing by his negligence betrayed his owne abilitie and power to haue withſtood him.

The great report of the Turks preparations and forces had now daſht all the talke of peace
The great opinion the Turkes haue of the power of their great Sultan. at CONSTANTINOPLE, and the hot fire of ambition had quite ſcorched the ſweet flowers appearing vpon the ouerture of the late hope of the common repoſe; ſome perſuading the Great Sultan, that hee was able with his power at the ſame time both to ſubdue the Perſian king, and to confound the forces of the Chriſtian Emperour, hauing ſo many kingdomes within his Empire, ſo many armories ſtored for his ſeruice, and ſuch ſtore of treaſure readie for his deſignes, promiſing vnto him moſt happy and eaſie ſucceſſe both in the one and other expedition, euen at one and the ſelfe ſame time: ſo that he might vanquiſh the Perſian by Ci- cala, chiefetaine of his armie in Perſia, and conquer the remainder of HVNGARIE, with the M countries of TRANSYLVANIA and VALACHIA, by the Viſier Baſſa, Generall of his forces a-gainſt the Chriſtians; it being (as they ſaid) a thing both honourable and profitable for a Prince to beſtow both men and money, thereby to gaine men, honour, and empire: So that

things which with great charge might be done all at once, were more profitable than were those which with lesse charge were done at diuers times: For that things so done at once, yeelded present profit, as being in our power, and recompensing our charge; the other in long time putting vs to great charge, and yeelding little or no profit at all. And indeed men stand in great feare of this the Turkes yong Emperour, being by nature fierce, hastie, vigilant, cruell, ambitious, and proud, and who in his behauiour and actions much resembleth Mahomet the second, he which tooke from the Christians so many kingdomes, townes, and cities, and amongst the rest, the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE. He like vnto a young Alexander, occupieth himselfe in all the exercises of warre, hateth idlenesse, his fathers greatest pleasure: he causeth armes to be made, cannons to be cast, ships and gallies to be built, and taketh a pleasure to discourse how the same are to be employed against his enemies: so that it is greatly to be feared, that he being but a child in CONSTANTINOPLE, will proue a man growen in Christendome, in bringing the same vnder his power and obeysance. He spareth no person nor meanes which may serue to satisfie his desire. So that strangers are to expect small courtesie at his hands, when as they see him to vse such bloudie crueltie against his noblemen and domesticall seruants, of the chiefest of whom since he was Emperour hee hath alreadie put diuers to death, with one of his Bassaes also, who was the Gouernour of PESTH when as our men woon it. But as iustice and clemencie vnto good princes are the surest bonds to keepe their subiects fast bound vnto them in their obedience and duties, so are crueltie and rage bridles wherewith the Turkish Emperours keepe their subjects in awe and subjection vnto them, and themselues in their estate

But leauing the Turks busie about their preparations for the accomplishing of their young Emperours high designes, let vs returne into HVNGARIE, taking TRANSYLVNIA in our way, the wofull miseries of which countrey my mind abhorreth to thinke vpon, and my penne thereof to write. This prouince, sometime much renowmed, for the great victories obtained against the Turkes by the inhabitants thereof, vnder the leading of their prince Sigismund Bator, and others, and abounding with plenty of all things, was now not by any inuasion of the Turks, but by ciuil discord amongst themselues and rebellion against the Emperour, now their Soueraigne, so wasted and spoyled by the souldiors one all sides, that many of the poore inhabitants for want of food fell down dead as they went in the streets & fields: miserable wretches, alwaies sowing, but neuer reaping, alwayes labouring, but nothing profiting, the mercilesse and greedie souldior still spoyling or deuouring all. By long continuance of which daily outrages the fields at length lay now vntilled, the pastures vnstored and neglected, and all things else vnmanured and quite out of course: by meanes whereof, the famine so encreased, that the poore pesants of the countrey hauing eaten vp for great dainties al the dogs and cats, mice and rats, that they could get, fell to eating of dead horses, & the loathsome carrion of other hunger-starued beasts. It is reported also, That one man should eat another: And that at HERMANSTAT a woman hauing sixe children, did among them eat one another, vntill they were at length all six deuoured: and to the contrarie, that two men did eat their own mother: yea, theeues and other malefactors hanged for their villanies, were by the poore and miserable hungrie people cut downe from the gallowes, & deuoured, the people generally liuing vpon nothing but vpon the roots of weeds, greene hearbes, and the leaues of trees. For remedie of which so extreame miseries, it was on all partes agreed, That a generall assembly of the States of the whole prouince should be holden at DEVVA: Wherein it was accorded, That all hostilitie set apart, the gentlemen of TRANSYLVANIA hauing by their rebellion forfeited both their liues and lands, should bee pardoned their liues, with three fourth parts of their lands reserued vnto them, and that for readie money they might of the Emperour redeeme the fourth part also. But concerning the moueables of such as were dead in the time of these troubles, and alreadie confiscat vnto the Emperour, they should so remaine; and that they should pay their dismes, or tenth part of their wine and fruits, vnto the Emperour. And farther, That there should be no farther exercise of religion permitted vnto them, but onely the Romish religion: And that the townes of CRONSTADT and CLAVSENBVRG should within the space of three weekes pay, the one twentie thousand dollars, and the other eight thousand; and the magistrats of those townes should deliuer the keyes of their townes, with all their power, into the hands of the Emperours rours Lieutenant: and that the gentlemen of these townes which would not be accounted in the G number of the rebels, should for the safetie of their persons take letters of pardon for their rebellion, of the Generall of the armie. This pacification gaue some little time of breathing vnto this poore distressed country, which bared of all strength, and as it were vpon the graues brinke, had now but euen the last gaspe to giue; and the countrey people began agane to giue themselues vnto their wonted labours, in hope at length to reape the profit thereof themselues; but alas all in vaine: for why, the rauening souldiors enured to prey, after their wonted manner made hauoke and spoyle of all things, leauing nothing vnto the poore countrey man, but his labour for his paine, and time ynough to bewaile his manifold and remedilesse miseries: the causes whereof were the nobilitie and gentlemen themselues; who not liking to bee gouerned, or rather (as they tooke it) oppressed by the Germans, and hauing not vpon any desire they had H of peace, but rather by necessitie enforced, yeelded vnto the pacification aforesaid, ceased not still vnder hand to incite the souldiors (readie ynough of themselues to doe mischiefe) and in what they might to trouble the gouernment of the state by the Germanes, being vnto them (as they accounted of them) but strangers. All which their doings Basta the Emperours Liuetenant well perceiuing, caused three of the greatest of the gentlemen of the countrey, and whom hee most suspected to bee the authors of these troubles, to bee apprehended and fast mured vp betwixt two strong wals in an old ruinous monasterie; whither their friends afterwards comming to haue visited them, and finding them starued to death, were therewith much abashed, as were also other their complices, as soone as they heard thereof. But leauing them to worke themselues farther troubles, let vs againe returne vnto the I

The troubles of Transyluania secretly maintained by the nobilitie of the Country.

A seuere and miserable kind of punishment

Now was all the hope of peace betwixt the Christians and the Turkes become desperate, the Turks making thereof no more account, seeing that according to their desire they had prouided ALBA REGALIS, AGRIA, and BVDA of their necessarie prouisions. They had in foure waggons put into AGRIA the pay due vnto their garrisons; so that their affaires being now in good estate, and their courages reuiued, they began to scoffe and jest at our credulitie, to beleeue that they had had any purpose to conclude vpon any thing that was not agreeing with their profit, how farre soeuer it were differing from their honour or from their faith: So that now these faithlesse men began againe to renew their wonted incursions and pillages vpon the Christians, with all other manner of hostilitie, and that in more cruell manner than euer before: And K our Hussards on the other side well requited them with the like, being as well contented as they with these manner of doings, their whole fortune depending vpon the points of their weapons, and euer readie to the seruice of their prince for their pay. Now it fortuned, that fourescore of the Turks going forth to seek for bootie, chaunced to meet with certaine of these Hussards, who finding themselus too weake to encounter with our men, and betaking themselues to flight, were certaine of them taken prisoners, and so brought vnto the Generall: vnto whom they vpon examination confessed, That the Turks much maruelled at the simplicitie and foolishnesse of the Christians, to beleeue that they where desirous of peace, and not to haue discouered their so manifest intentions to the contrarie, tending onely to the pleasuring of themselues, and the annoying of them their enemies, to the strengthening of themselues and destruction of the L Christians, as by proofe it appeared, so soone as their desires were accomplished, vnto the prejudice of their enemies: And that their yong Emperour was alwaies against this treatie of peace, whatsoeuer shew he had made to the contrarie, constrained thereunto by the victories and conquests of the Persian king; all his wishes and desires aiming at no other marke, than at the generall ruine of Christendome. Our garrisons also seeing themselues charged by the Turks, tooke vp armes likewise, and requited them with like outrages, as they did. They of PAPPA, and VESPRINIVM, were the first which began these broyles after the treatie of the peace, who hauing joyned their forces together, and making heade toward ALBA REGALIS, met with a number of Turkes, driuing of sheep and cattell thither, whom they surprized, and together with their cattell carried them away with them prisoners. Which good hap was seconded with the libertie of twentie Christian prisoners from BVDA, who one night seeing their keepers opressed with sleepe and with wine, cut their throats, and so happily escaped ouer the riuer to PESTH. Now

A Now while theſe troubles betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turkes (after the treatie of peace broken off) thus began againe in HVNGRIE, the Turks, beſide the rebellion in ASIA, were together by the eares in the prouince of BOSNA. Zellaly hauing by force ioyned vnto policie, driuen Zeffer Baſſa (as is aforeſaid) out of BOSNA, and poſſeſſed himſelfe of that prouince, thought himſelfe now ſure ynough within the ſtrength of his gouernment, although he being by the great Sultan ſent for to CONSTANTINOPLE, had refuſed to come, as knowing right well himſelfe to hold that ſo great a gouernment much againſt his will and pleaſure. But Zeffer Baſſa now ſupported with the authoritie of the Great Sultan, and deſirous to be reuenged of the great diſhonour and loſſe he had before receiued from Zellaly his enemie, with a great armie ſuddainely entred into BOSNA, and ſo comming vnto Zellaly, fearing as then no ſuch matter, ouerthrew him with all his power, and neuer left purſuing of him, vntill he had chaſed him
B quite out of the prouince, and ſo againe recouered the gouernment thereof. But ſhort was the ioy the Baſſa receiued of this ſo pleaſing a victorie, for within a few daies after he died, comforting himſelfe onely in this, that he died not vnreuenged. Of all which things the great Baſſaes of the Court vnderſtanding, and loath to loſe ſo great a ſouldiour as was Zellaly (who as a man diſtreſſed was now making ſhift for himſelfe) or by vſing of him hardly, to deterre the other Aſian rebels from comming in, and yet not willing to truſt him with ſo great a gouernment as was the prouince of BOSNA, they to prouide for all euents, appointed him to bee Gouernour of TEMESVVAR, and Begedes Baſſa, before Gouernour there, to ſucceed Zeffer Baſſa in the gouern-
C ment of BOSNA: So contenting all parties, to keepe their forces whole and entire againſt the Chriſtians.

Zeffer Baſſa recouereth the gouernment of Boſna from Zellaly, and ſhortly after dieth.

Zellaly made Gouernor of Temeſwar.

But as the Turkes were troubled with their affaires in BOSNA, ſo the Chriſtians were no leſſe but rather more buſied with theirs both in TRANSILVANIA and HVNGARIE. The Eſtates of HVNGARIE had appointed a generall meeting at POSSONIVM, wherein the Archduke Matthias was to ſit as Preſident, there to conſult of the meanes for the maintenance of this yeares warres againſt the Turke. But as the Archduke was about to haue entred into the citie in the middeſt of his ſouldiors, ſuch a fire vpon the ſuddaine aroſe in the citie, as conſumed the greateſt part thereof: an euill preſage of the action then in hand, and a wofull ſpectacle to behold, with the terrour whereof all mens minds poſſeſſed, turned them from the magnificent entertaining of the Arch-duke (as was before determined) to the quenching of the raging fire, as D more neceſſarie and concerning them than the other. Beſides that, the miſeries then to be ſeene in the other parts of HVNGARIE, yet holden by the Chriſtians, were both great and lamentable: for beſide the harmes therin done by the Turks, the regiment of Colonel Althem had made ſuch ſpoile and hauocke all ouer the countrey where it lay, that the townes and people in generall ſo grieuouſly complained thereof vnto the Emperour, that hee moued with their iuſt complaints, cauſed the authors of theſe ſo great outrages to be apprehended and brought priſoners to VIENNA, where ſome of them were beheaded, and ſome others of them hanged: Beſide whom ſo condemned and executed, there were ſome other captaines and lieutenants, of whom, ſome denying the fact, and otherſome ſtanding vpon the iuſtifying of that they had done, as thereunto by extreame neceſſitie enforced, were for their farther triall ſent priſoners vnto PRAGE, where
E they were committed vnto priſon into the caſtle, vntill their cauſes might bee heard: amongſt which captains and lieutenants, and other ſuch great officers, was one Genderot Colonel Althem his Auncient, who moſt wickedly but a little before had ſlaine Neudercy, a gentleman of good ſort, and his fellow & companion in armes: For which murther he was committed priſoner into a very high and ſtrong tower within the caſtle (wherein Countie Paradiſer, who ſold CANISIA vnto the Turks, lay ſometime priſoner) vntill his triall might within a few daies after bee made. The horror of which criminall place, together with the guilt of conſcience, ſo troubled & wounded the mind of Genderot, as that all the hope now to ſaue his life, was by making of an eſcape, and ſo to auoid the ſtroke of juſtice. Which he happily brought to paſſe by the helpe of one of his lacquies, who had found meanes to bring vnto him a long cord, where, by ſtraining himſelfe
F out at a little window (whereby it was thought almoſt impoſſible for any man to haue got out) he in ſafetie got down to the ground, and there hauing two good horſes ready for him, hee with his man fled amaine, and ſo eſcaped, his keepers drunken ouer night, being in the morning found yet ſleeping, without perceiuing of any thing, whoſe drunkennes & fauour toward the priſoner had had giuen him meanes to escape. The rest of the captaines and licutenants in prison at PRAGE G were some of them beheaded, and some of them hanged, and the rest at the intercession of the nobilitie of AVSTRIA, and of other great men pardoned, yet with condition, That they should pay the fines set vpon them, and serue the Emperour in his warres three moneths of their owne charge, without pay: some few of the common souldiors, to the terror of others, had two of the fore-fingers of their right hands cut off, and afterward fast nayled vnto gibbets set vp by the high waies side.

The regiment of Colonell Meysberg in mutinie.

In like maner also the regiment of Colonell Meysberg rose in mutinie for their pay, and came and encamped at SNECHE, about a league from VIENNA, threatning to destroy the countrie, and to kill the chiefe men therein, if they were not paid their pay. Which rebellious mutinie the captains did what they might to appease, they besought them but in vaine, they entreated them but H to no purpose, they promised them pay, but preuailed not; yea, the Colonel himself thrust himselfe into the middest of them, with most earnest prayers, and his hands cast vp, putting them in mind of their dutie, and laying before them the danger of most assured death and dishonour, if they continued farther to proceed in that their disloyaltie, whereunto their headstrong furie so so disordredly led them. But they as men enraged, carried headlong with their furie, breathing nothing but threats and destruction, and by no prayers or persuasion to be mooued, presently made choice of another chiefetaine, vnder whose conduct and leading they resolued to rifle the suburbs of VIENNA, & with the spoile of them to pay themselues. Vpon which resolution they marched on, and so drew neere vnto the citie: with which their so great and dangerous an insolencie the gouernors of the citie moued (the sufferance wherof they accounted to be vnto them- I selues both dishonourable & harmfull) they on the other side resolued by plaine force to repres them, and by iust armes to chastice them, who were not otherwise to be reclaimed. But such bee the miserable calamities of war, where violent remedies must purge out of the bodie of the commonweale the good humours, togither with the bad, so to recouer the health thereof: which remedies, not but vpon necessitie to be vsed, are so quicke & violent in their working, as that they affoord not leisure to discerne the whole and sound from the sicke and infected, to saue the one and to spill the other, but that they must altogither run the selfesame way. For albeit that the whole regiment was in this mutinous action, and so all in like danger, yet were they not thereof all alike guiltie, many of them being euen against their wils and good liking carried away headlong, as with the violent course of an headie riuer. K

Now the captaines of the towne with their troupes and companies, strengthened with some other supplie sent from other places, were to set forward against these rebellious mutiners, and to frustrate their designes: for the greater strengthening of whom, diuers of the burgesses of the towne were enforced to enter into this action also: amongst whom, there were two accounted very honest religious men, who by all meanes sought to excuse themselues from going, labouring both by liuely reasons, and by the word of God, to prooue, that they neither might nor ought of right to enter into armes against their Christian brethren, enforced with extremities, for want of their due pay, to forget their duetie, and to do that beseemed them not. But what auaileth it to alleadge either reason or law amongst the clattering of armes; the noise whereof is so great, as that reason and law cannot there bee heard. These L
two men seeing themselues enforced to goe, and much grieued in conscience to doe that they were enioyned to doe, and to helpe to shed the guiltlesse bloud of their innocent brethren (as they accounted them) entred both of them into a most strange and wofull resolution, which was, to die themselues; rather than to embrue their hands with the bloud of the guiltlesse: whereupon one of them hauing oftentimes called vpon the name of Iesus, with his owne sword thrust himselfe through the bodie, and so died; the other vpon the like resolution threw himselfe into the riuer, and so perished also: men worthie to bee pitied for their conscience sake, but iustly to bee condemned for their so weake and desperat a resolution. In fine, the rebellious mutiners seeing in what perill they were, being euen now readie to be charged, and M withall considering the weakenesse of their power in comparison of them that came against them, thought it best vpon the sight of so great a tempest to strike sayle; and so changing their former determination, and laying downe their armes, craued pardon of the Archduke, who graciously graunted it them, and so tooke them to his mercie, yet with condition, that they

A ſhould againe returne vnto their garriſons, and deliuer into his hands the ringleaders and chiefe authors of that mutinie to be puniſhed according to their deſerts, as afterwards they were: the ordinarie end of ſuch inſolent and diſordered actions, which haue nothing aſſured vnto them but death, which (all things elſe failing) attendeth onely vpon them.

But while the Chriſtians thus diuided were at variance among themſelues, the Turks were readie ynough to take aduantage of ſuch their dangerous diſcord. And firſt of all, Zellaly the old rebell, but now gouernour of TEMESVVAR, hauing in his craftie head plotted the taking of the citie of LIPPA by ſurprize, and to that purpoſe gathering the greateſt power that he was able to make, in the euening ſet forward from TEMESVVAR, and ſo trauelling by night, came to LIPPA, vnto the walls whereof he planted ſcaling ladders, and at the ſame time la-
B boured to haue forced the gates, in hope ſo to haue gained the towne: which was done with ſuch a terrible noyſe & outcrie as was poſſible by the Turks to be made, after that they were once diſcouered, thereby to haue diſmayed the Chriſtians within the towne; who well acquainted with ſuch ſtratagemes of their enemies, and now therewith awaked, came readily to the wals, and there ſo well defended themſelues and their towne, that the Turks repulſed, were glad to giue ouer the aſſault, and hauing loſt a number of their men, with all ſpeed to retyre; vpon whom the Chriſtians ſallying out, ſlew many of them in that their diſordered retreat, little differing from plaine flight, and tooke many moe of them priſoners: yea, Zellaly, who not many houres before had thought to haue ſurpriſed LIPPA, was now glad himſelfe to haue recouered the wals of TEMESVVAR. Some of the Turkes that were there ta-
C ken priſoners being examined, reported, That the armie that was this yeare to come into HVNGARIE, was like to be very great, and that a part thereof was now come to BELGRADE, expecting there the comming of the Tartars, who were together with them to enter into HVNGARIE: and that by reaſon of the warres with the Perſian, which deuoured almoſt all the ſouldiours in CONSTANTINOPLE, and yet could not be therewith ſatisfied, the Great Sultan had commaunded, That all ſuch as were able to beare armes, as well in BOSNA, as in that part of HVNGARIE which was ſubiect vnto him, and in the other prouinces thereunto adioyning, ſhould be readie to ioine with his armie in HVNGARIE, for the furthering of his conqueſts there: And that the Perſian king proſecuting the courſe of his victories, had ouerthrowne Cicala Baſſa with his armie, and taken his ſonne priſoner, almoſt ſlaine all his troups,
D and entred into confederacie with Caracaſe, chiefe of the rebels in ASIA, a man of great power, who had following of him a great number of valiant men, all reſolutely ſet downe for the troubling of the Great Sultans eſtate.

The Turks in vaine ſeeke to ſurprize Lippa.

About the ſame time the Gouernour of CASSOVIA (a great and ſtrong citie in the vpper part of HVNGARIE) going forth with ſome good part of his garriſon to appeaſe the ſouldiours lying about in the countrie, but now vp in mutinie for their pay, and there ſpending ſome few daies about this buſineſſe, in ſhewing of them the danger of their inſolencie, and perſuading them by the euill ſucceſſe and end of ſuch like actions to returne againe vnto their dueties; and they againe to the contrarie obſtinatly vrging the payment of their pay, or elſe to haue leaue to depart, as being not able longer to continue without the one or the o-
E ther: and ſo the time paſſing, it fortuned, that certain Turks, then priſoners in CASSOVIA, encouraged by the abſence of the Gouernour and of the garriſon ſouldiours to attempt the gaining of their libertie, brake their yrons, and ſlew their keepers, in hope ſo to haue eſcaped: but being in the doing thereof diſcouered, and ſo againe ſurprized, before they could do any further harme, and vpon torture examined, by what means they thought to haue eſcaped out of the citie, the wals thereof being kept with contiuall ſentinels: they confeſſed, That their purpoſe was, the ſame night to haue ſet fire vpon diuers places of the citie (ſo to haue drawne the people to the quenching thereof) and at the ſame time to haue ſlain the ſentinels vpon the wals, and ſo to haue made their eſcape: for which their ſo miſchieuous a fact and purpoſe, they were ſome of them executed, and the reſt againe committed to priſon, and F more ſtraitly kept and looked vnto than before.

Caſſona in danger to haue been burnt by the Turkes.

Now as CASSOVIA had by the prouidence of God eſcaped ſo great an intended miſchiefe, ſo CANISIA at the ſame time alone felt the euill hap by the Turkes, intended both to CASSOVIA and LIPPA: for a ſoldior of the garriſon in the citadell there hauing through negligence or miſhap caſt fire into the pouder, prouided for the ſtore of the caſtle, the pouder taking fire, blew vp the citadell, the towers, the houſes and wals: and to be briefe, made this poore place like vnto another ROME burnt by Nero. So that had any of the Chriſtian forces beene then neere vnto the place, it had beene an eaſie matter to haue woon the ſame, as well for the ſmall reſiſtance that was therein to haue been found in ſo great an aſtoniſhment of the men, and deſtruction of the place. But ſuch accidents haue no certaine houres limited to their beginnings, nor aſſurance of their comming, ſo that they oftentimes chance, without any man to make vſe of them, and againe flie away, when men make their greateſt preparations to obtaine them. G

At the ſame time the Turks of BVDA ſent two hundred of the ſouldiours of their garriſon to fetch in forrage a little from PERTH, who as they were in the doing thereof too preſumptuous, ſo were they well puniſhed for their pride: For the Chriſtians in PESTH hauing diſcouered them in this action, ſallied out vpon them and charged them; againſt whom they for a while right valiantly defended themſelues, but at length oppreſſed with number, and ouerthrowne, they were moſt of them ſlaine, and the reſt taken priſoners: Wherwith the Baſſa of BVDA was ſo much offended, that in reuenge thereof he in his rage threatened with fire and ſword to do what harme he might vnto the Chriſtians. But (as the common prouerbe ſaith) men warned are halfe armed; and enemies threats bring this comfort with them, that in receiuing of the threatned harmes, we are in hope to be thereof reuenged, as therefore before prouided. H

Vnto theſe wofull troubles of HVNGARIE, proceeding as well from the inſolencies of the Chriſtian ſouldiours themſelues, as from the furie of the Turkes, who were their auncient and mortall enemies, were ioyned the like or rather worſe calamities in TRANSYLVANIA, extreame famine and want of all things ſore raging in both countries; ſo that hardly hath any miſerie or extreamitie beene ſeene or read of, euen in countries by the iuſt and heauie iudgements of the Almightie God appointed to deſtruction, which were not in thoſe two countries to bee found, and of many felt. For remedie whereof, George Baſta the Emperours Lieutenant in TRANSYLVANIA, had there done what he might for the appeaſing of the tumults and troubles of that prouince, and now of late brought the ſame into ſome good tearmes, as was thought, and as is before declared. Howbeit, that in proofe it fell out farre otherwiſe, and that the more he therein laboured, the farther he was off from his intent and purpoſe: fore the nobilitie of that Prouince who were generally enclined vnto rebellion, and deteſting the Germanes, together with their gouernement, reiected the decrees and orders which were agreed vpon in their late meeting together for the concluding of peace; inſomuch, that aſſiſted by the Turkes, they had taken certaine caſtles and ſtrong places in that Prouince: and the better to ſupport their rebellion and inſolencie, they had appointed a certaine place to meet at, where the Turkes and they might conferre together of the meanes which they intended for the effecting of their deſignes. Wherefore Baſta hauing by ſecret means got vnderſtanding, to remedie this pretended miſchiefe, he ſent away a great number of Haiduckes, to lye in wait to ſurpriſe them vpon the way. Which men, who were skilfull in the paſſages of the countrie, failed not in this action, but lay cloſe in ambuſh, verie conueniently for the ſurpriſing of their enemies: who proceeding in their intended purpoſe, and thinking of nothing leſſe than of that which was intended againſt them, were ſuddenly, before they were aware, Turkes and Tranſyluanians, altogether ſurpriſed and ſlaine. Which exploit being performed, theſe Haiduckes and other ſouldiours deſtitute of their pay, and enraged with furie, fell vpon the prouince, vſing therein all hoſtilitie, as if they had been mortall enemies vnto it, puniſhing the guiltleſſe for the guiltie, and ſeiſing vpon all mens goods in common, to pay themſelues that which was by ſome few in priuate kept from them. All the whole Prouince was ſubiect vnto the rage and furie of theſe and other ſuch mercileſſe men of warre, who without any remorſe at all indifferently ſlew and maſſacred all of them that came in their way, but eſpecially the poore and weake innocent people, who called vpon the Almightie God for remedie and redreſſe of theſe euils which they ſuſtained, and cried out vnto him for reuenge of their ſo great and cruell wrongs. The high waies were euerie where ſo full of theeues, that no man could trauell from place to place, but that hee was in great danger to be ſet vpon, and ſpoiled. For the Haiducks (being men that liue altogether by prey, and roaming vp and downe the countrie) made good prize and bootie of whatſoeuer I K L M

A came in their way, ſparing neither Turkes nor Chriſtians: inſomuch, that they hearing, how that the Zecclers with a good conuoy were bringing a number of waggons laden with victuals, and a great many of oxen and other cattell to CLAVDINOPLE, although they were of the ſame partie, beliefe, and nation, yet they lay in wait for them to ſurprize them: againſt whom the Zecclers ſeeking to defend themſelues, were by them cruelly maſſacred, and their waggons, with their Beeues and other cattell, all carried quite away. But what ſhould wee ſay? Hunger breaketh euen the ſtone walls, and forceth men vnto all extremities: And now the famine in that Prouince was ſuch, as that the people were for the moſt part glad to liue by feeding vpon the roots of hearbes and weeds, and ſuch other vnwhole-
B ſome things, whereof great mortalitie afterward enſued amongſt them: Which was the cauſe that Horwat, captaine of theſe Haiduckes, being reproued for the outrages by them committed, and charged to take order, that no more ſuch like ſhould afterward bee done, anſwered, That it was not poſſible to keepe ſouldiours in any order amiddeſt the extremitie of famine; for that the belly was an inexorable vſurer, which tooke pitie vpon nothing, but with great rage exacting that which it thought due for the nouriſhment of it ſelfe.

Captaine Horwat his anſwer in excuſe of the Haiduckes.

Amiddeſt theſe troubles of TRANSYLVANIA and HVNGARIE, there were two of the Turkes ſpyes of BVDA diſcouered and taken, who at VIENNA, had obſerued all the actions and proceedings of the Chriſtians, and to the vttermoſt of their power had in-
C formed themſelues of their deſignes, as alſo of their preparations and forces to be rayſed and leuied for this yeares warres: of which two ſpyes, the one was empayled, and the other kept in cloſe and ſtrait priſon, vntill that further matter might bee drawne out from him.

Two of the Turks ſpies of Buda taken.

The forces of the Chriſtians were now beginning to gather themſelues together and to make an head in HVNGARIE, a rife report at that time going, That they would forthwith take the field: whereof the Baſſa of BVDA vnderſtanding, and deſirous in what he might to hinder that their forwardneſſe, whereof hee doubted the effects, thought it beſt to betake himſelfe to his old and cunning practiſe, for the treatie and concluding of a peace with the Chriſtians, whereof hee now made ſhew himſelfe, together with the reſt
D of the Turkes, to be verie deſirous, ſo by putting the Chriſtians in hope thereof, to make them the more remiſſe and negligent in their doings, and to gaine time of them, vntill that the Turkes great armie (then in preparing) might be brought downe into HVNGARIE. To which purpoſe hee in moſt friendly manner thus writ vnto the Gouernour of STRIGONIVM.

Wee know right well (Noble Gouernour) that you are not ignorant, how that your brother the Gouernour of STRIGONIVM before you, hath moſt earneſtly embraced the negotiation of peace, in ſuch ſort, as that wee cannot ſo much yeeld vnto our ordinarie quarrels and diſſentin, but that wee muſt giue you to vnderſtand the cauſes which haue croſſed and hindered the concluE ding of ſo great a good the laſt yeare now paſſed. The firſt let came by reaſon of the time, choſen too late to bee employed in that treatie for peace, when as now both the armies were alreadie on foot, and euen in readineſſe to ioyne battaile, and could not bee then ſtayed by that entreatie, nor bee ſent backe againe without ſome exploit doing: Each part had reſolued vpon their proper deſignes, and euen choſen their ground for battaile, and were then hardly to be turned from that whereupon they were before reſolued. And albeit, that during this laſt Winter, the treatie for the peace was againe begun, and that the men of warre on both ſides in hope thereof, reſted vnarmed, and free from all hoſtilitie; a moſt fit time to haue begun and ended this treatie of peace, which hath beene ſo much wiſhed for of our Soueraigne Emperour, deſired of his ſubiects, and requeſted by thoſe of your Emperours, with whom my dread Soueraigne would confirme and conF tract a firme and continuall peace: yet for all that, ſince the departure of the Gouernour from STRIGONIVM, wee ſee three monethes to haue beene paſſed, without any letters at all, or meſſage by word of mouth brought vnto vs concerning this matter; ſo that wee haue not any thing whereof to certifie our Soueraigne Emperour. And for as much as the courſe of time hath brought theſe two contrarie armies euen vnto the point of battell, and that they are marching one of them to encounter with the other, and ſo to enter into the liſts of honour, wee haue thought good before to deſire to know of you, what wee are to expect concerning the peace. Wee therefore requeſt you as our verie good brother and friend, in what wee may to ſtay the comming of our armies into this kingdome, and to attend to that which may produce the concluſion of this treatie, being on our part moſt readie to lend both our eare and deſire to whatſoeuer ſhall bee iuſt and meete in this treatie, and neceſſarie for the common good: beſeeching you to belieue vs in this buſineſſe, and not to doubt of our good will, more affected to your good, than is yours to our welfare: whereof wee in good time aduertiſe you, for that our armie which is now before BELGRADE, being once arriued here, and marching in field, wee cannot poſsibly cauſe it to returne without ſomething doing, conſidering the great harmes, which vnder the aſſurance of your faith giuen, wee haue receiued from your people during the time of the truce, which they haue many waies violated. Which their euill dealing hath greatly incenſed vs againſt your men in captiuitie with vs, and cauſed our ſoldiors to ſhew great rigour againſt their ſlaues: we therefore attend your anſwere, and the returne of your brother, to the end we may together reſolue according vnto reaſon and equitie, of that which ſhall bee needfull to bee done for the common good and welfare.

Now for all this faire gloſing, it was no hard matter to gheſſe at the Baſſaes ſecret meaning: for how deſirous ſoeuer hee ſeemed to bee of peace, and willing to the furtherance thereof, yet neuertheleſſe true it is, that during the time of all theſe faire ſhewes, the Turkes hauing aſſembled their garriſons on all ſides, had by night ſurprized the caſtle of SIMNIN vpon the Chriſtians, ſlaine part of the ſouldiours therein, carried away the reſt priſoners, and moſt cruelly afterwards burnt the place. So manifeſting by their foule deedes the euill meaning of their faire and deceitfull words. But now leauing the Baſſa for a while vnto his craftie deuices, and paſſing ouer many ſmall skirmiſhes which happened in HVNGARIE and TRANSILVANIA, as not beſeeming the grauitie of an Hiſtorie, let vs now out of EVROPE looke ouer into ASIA, to ſee how the Great Turkes affaires there in the meane time went.

The rebellion in ASIA was by the comming ouer of Zellaly and his followers for a time ſomewhat weakened, but not ſuppreſſed, that peſtilent humour of diſloyaltie hauing before infected the minds of ſo many, as that in ſhort time after the rebels were much ſtronger, and the rebellion much more daungerous than before: for the appeaſing and repreſſing whereof, Cicala Baſſa the old renegate, and a man of great experience and ſeruice, was as Generall ſent ouer with a great and mightie armie into ASIA, where he needed not long to ſeeke for his enemies, they being as readie as he either to giue or to accept of battaile: So that for men ſo on both ſides reſolued, it was no hard matter to bring them to the trial of battaile: which they with like deſire and equall hope ioyning, there made a great and terrible fight, the Baſſa fighting for his honour, and the rebell for his life. Howbeit, that at length the Baſſa after much bloudſhed & a great number on both ſides ſlain, being put to the worſe, fled with his armie altogether diſordered and in rout, hauing in that ſo dangerous a confuſion of his people much adoe to ſaue himſelfe. With which ſo ſhamefull an ouerthrow giuen him by the rebell, the Baſſa who was more aſhamed than diſcouraged, againe repaired his armie, ioyning thereunto great and mightie ſupplies, and ſo ſtrengthened, came now againe the ſecond time to reuenge himſelfe of the great diſhonour which hee had before receiued, and vtterly to ſuppreſſe the rebels: who now finding themſelues too weake to encounter with ſo great and mightie a power, wiſely betime retyred, praying aide of the Perſian king, who ſent vnto them his owne ſonne with a great armie of good and valiant ſouldiours; which might haue giuen the Baſſa cauſe ynough to haue ſtayed his haſt, and to haue beene well aduiſed how he ioyned battaile with ſuch deſperate and reſolute enemies, and now backt with ſuch ſtrong ſupplies: But hee being blinded with the furie of his former loſſe, and too much deſirous to be thereof reuenged, with more haſt than good ſpeed came on, and ioyned battaile with theſe his enemies, now in readineſſe and well prouided to receiue him. The two armies were in number equall, but the rebels of the two more reſolute and carefull of themſelues and of their welfare, as they which had repoſed all their hope and confidence in their owne armes and valour, ſo that the battaile was with great outcries and furie begun both on the

A one ſide and the other: in the beginning whereof the Turkes right furiouſly charged the rebels, and ſeemed ſomewhat to preuayle vpon them, vntill that the Perſian kings ſonne with certaine troupes of his moſt braue horſemen charging them in the rereward, and ſome other of the rebels with like furie aſſayling them vpon their flankes, their whole armie was ſo diſordered, that Cicala doing what he could to haue put his men againe in order, and ſo to haue reſtored the battaile, nothing therein preuailed, but was glad together with the reſt of his armie, now all in rout, to betake himſelfe to flight. In this battell were fortie thouſand men on the one ſide and the other ſlaine, whereof thirtie thouſand were of the Baſſaes armie, and the reſt of the rebels; who by this their ſo great a victorie gained no leſſe honour and reputation, than had the old Baſſa got of contempt and diſgrace. The Perſian king alſo after
B this diſcomfiture of Turkes continuing his conqueſts, tooke in the countrie of SIRVAN (a matter of great importance) being now deſtitute of all relieſe by the ouerthrow of Cicala Baſſa, who, had he preuayled againſt the rebels, ſhould haue marched thither againſt the Perſian king, to haue ſtayed the courſe of his victories: who now victorious and out of feare, made head toward ARVSTA, a verie great and ſtrong towne, neere whereunto the riuer Tygris diſchargeth it ſelfe into the great riuer Euphrates, which citie hee at laſt woon, with all the places and countries thereunto adioyning; and hath ſince as a moſt happie and victorious Prince againe recouered from the Turks whatſoeuer they had ſince the time of Sultan Solyman by force of armes taken from the Perſian kings his predeceſſours, two or three ſtrong places onely excepted. Of which moſt notable warres betwixt theſe two of the moſt
C mightie Eaſterne princes, viz. the Great Turkes and the Perſian king, I can rather wiſh than hope to be better enformed, and that, not ſo much for curioſitie (although that the knowledge of ſuch maters yeeld vnto ſuch as be deſirous thereof much pleaſure, with no leſſe contentment) as for that they (though farre off) in ſome ſort much concerne the good and quiet of the Chriſtian Commonweale, the Perſian warres being the only means whereby the furie of the Great Turkiſh Sultan hath beene and yet is for a time auerted from the Chriſtians in EVROPE vpon the Perſians in ASIA: as it is greatly to be feared, that ſome one or other (if not moe) of the Chriſtian Princes neereſt vnto him, ſhall to their great coſt and harme feele, ſo ſoone as theſe two great Mahometane princes ſhall bee at peace betwixt themſelues. But leaue wee the Baſſa a while to grieue at his ouerthrowes, and the Perſian
D king to triumph of this victories, and ſee what the Great Sultan himſelfe in the meane time doth.

Cicala Baſſa againe ouerthrow.

The ſucceſſe of the Perſian king

This young Prince Achmat, now one of the greateſt Monarches of the world, had not many moneths raigned, but that hee fell ſicke of the ſmall poxe, wherewith hee hauing a groſſe and full bodie, was ſo foulely tormented for the ſpace of foureteene dayes, that oftentimes fainting, it was generally thought he would thereof haue died: yea, diuers of the great Baſſaes were in ſpeech concerning his younger brother to bee taken out of the Seraglio to ſucceed him: which was thought would haue coſt the younger brother his life, after that the Sultan his elder brother was againe recouered; as no doubt it had, but that hee was the onely heire that was then left of the Othoman familie, if that his brother the Sultan
E ſhould haue fayled. But he againe recouered of his foule and childiſh diſeaſe, to ſhew vnto the Ianizaries and others (who doubted thereof) that he was ſo recouered, proudly mounted vpon a goodly horſe, moſt ſumptuouſly furniſhed, and in great ſtate and magnificence rid vp and downe through moſt of the chiefe ſtreets of the imperiall citie, the people (as their accuſtomed manner is) in euerie place as he went reioycing to ſee him, and proſecuting him with their moſt ioyfull acclamations, wiſhing vnto him a moſt long and happie raigne. Neither is it to be maruelled, ſeeing that the Almightie God hath euen in the faces and countenances of Princes engrauen ſome reſemblance of his owne, if they become reſpectuous and admirable in the eyes and ſight of the common people, who cannot but honour them with their voices, whom God hath bleſſed with his power, & other his extraordinarie world-
F ly bleſſings.

Sultan Achmat ſick of the ſmall pox.

This young prince ſo recouered of his ſickneſſe, and hauing ſhewed himſelfe vnto his ſubiects, began forthwith to giue himſelfe (according vnto the heate of his youthfull ſpirit) immoderatly vnto the pleaſures of the field, and other ſuch violent exerciſes, being in their moderate vſe wholeſome, but in their violences much hurtfull, but eſpecially vpon the new recouerie of his late ſicknes, the griefes wherof came in haſt, but were to leaue him at leiſure. Whereupon two of his Baſſaes carefull of his health, were ſo bold, as out of their loue to reprooue him for ſuch his violent and immoderate exerciſes (the day not being long ynough for them) and by effectuall reaſons to diſſuade him from the ſame. But ſo farre off was hee from hearkening vnto their wholeſome perſuaſions, as that to the contrarie hee therewith enraged, thruſt them both out of their places. So dangerous a thing it is, euen in zeale and loue to preſume to controll great princes in their moſt vaine pleaſures; others in the meane time not louing them at all, but onely for their own profit attending vpon their idle appetites, enioying the preferments due vnto their more faithfull and loyall ſubiects, and yet ſecretly in themſelues ſmiling at the vanitie of ſuch as by whom they be ſo vnworthily honoured and promoted. G H

But as in the immoderat vſe of all things there is a ſacietie which breedeth a diſliking and diſtaſt of them; pleaſures being not by any meanes more commended, than by their nouelties and ſeldome vſe: ſo this young Sultan Achmat hauing glutted himſelfe with his pleaſures, began now to caſt his eyes vpon his other more neceſſarie affaires of ſtate, but eſpecially vpon his warres both with the Chriſtian Emperour and the Mahometane Perſian king. Now he was not ignorant of the great valour and ſufficiencie of Haſſan the Viſier Baſſa, for the managing of his warres in Hvngarie, wherein he had of long time beene exerciſed, and ſo therein beſt experienced. This old captaine pleaſed him beſt, whom as an old, expert, and politicke Generall, he reſolued to continue in his charge as Lieutenant Generall of his warres in Hvngarie, and by the continuation of him in ſo great and honourable a place, to bind him to all loyall ſeruices in thoſe warres, euen to the vttermoſt of his power. This Great Baſſa was then at Belgrade, vpon the frontier of his gouernment in doubtfull ſuſpence expecting the reſolution of his Prince concerning this buſineſſe, and yet in hope longing after a ſecond charge: Whoſe longing deſire Achmat quickly ſatisfied, by ſending vnto him both a commiſſion for the continuation of his charge and dignitie, and certaine honourable preſents in token of his extraordinarie fauour towards him; which were a Generals enſigne, with an Hungarian Mace of pure gold. Now whether theſe preſents ioyned vnto the continuation of his charge, were welcome vnto him, or not, ambitious minds (ſuch as was his) can eaſily tell: and hee to ſhew his contentment therewith, gaue thereof good teſtimonie by the publicke actions of ioy, cauſing all the great Ordnance of the place in thundering wiſe to be oftentimes diſcharged, and the Trumpets and Drummes to be moſt ioyfully ſounded. I K

In the meane time newes was brought to Constantinople, how that the Perſian king hauing muſtered his men, was in the field with aboue an hundred thouſand good ſouldiors, and that Bagages Baſſa, one of the great rebels in Asia, had confederated himſelfe with him, to the farther troubling of the Turkes eſtate. Whereupon Achmat, although he had before giuen order vnto Haſſan the Viſier Baſſa, his Lieutenant in Hvngarie for the beſieging and taking of Veradinvm, a ſtrong citie in the vpper Hvngarie, now by a meſſenger ſent in haſt, commaunded the ſame Baſſa, all other buſineſſes ſet apart, with all the power that he could make, forthwith to returne to Constantinople, there with him and the reſt of the Baſſaes to conſult and reſolue vpon the moſt neceſſarie warre, and of the readieſt meanes for the continuing of the ſame. For albeit that the Turkes were moſt deſirous to haue warres with the Chriſtians, and ſo (if it were poſſible) to haue conquered the remainders of Hvngarie, yet the danger of the Perſian warres and of the rebellion in Asia dayly more and more encreaſing, ſuffered them not wholly to attend vnto the warres againſt the Chriſtians in Hvngarie, but drew them now into a doubtful conſultation, which way firſt to turne their forces. But the Baſſa being come to Constantinople, the Graund Seignior tooke the paines and did him the honour to come vnto his houſe, whither the Counſell for the ſtate being aſſembled, it was there moſt proudly reſolued vpon, euen forthwith at one and the ſelfeſame time with equall forces to make warre both vpon the Chriſtian Emperour in Hvngarie, and the Perſian king in Asia, accounting themſelues ſtrong ynough to ſubdue and bring vnder foot both the one and the other, no power vpon earth being in their proud conceit of themſelues able to encounter or withſtand theirs. So for the managing of theſe warres, and of their ſo proud a reſolution to bee performed in ſo remote L M

Haſſan Baſſa ſent for to come to Conſtantinople.

A remote parts of the world, Hassan Bassa was continued in his charge, as Generall of the armie in HVNGARIE; and Cicala Bassa was appointed to haue the commaund of the armie to bee sent against the Persian: Two most expert captaines, being to fight against their hereditarie enemies, Hassan against the Christians, and Cicala against the Persians, by whom hee had not long before been euill vsed. An ordinarie policie of the Othoman emperours, not to commit the charge of their armies against the Christians, vnto renegates; for feare least they touched with some remorse of conscience, might betray the same, or otherwise deale vnfaithfully in their charge: but still to imploy them against the Persians, of whom they haue no further knowledge, but as of their enemies in the field. But Cicala Bassa well acquainted both with the difficultie and the danger of the Persian war, the scarres whereof he yet bare about with him, Hassan Bassa continued Generall of the Turks armie against the Christians, and Cicala appointed generall of their armie against the Persians.

B made shew as if he had been vnwilling to take vpon him the charge thereof, and so begun to excuse himselfe, vntill that at length vpon promise made vnto him, for the furnishing of him with a sufficient armie, and all things els necessarie for so great a warre, with a large and most honourable entertainment for himselfe, and all the Persian prisoners being also giuen vnto him in reward; he therewith contented, accepted of the honorable charge, wherof in his ambitious mind he was indeed most desirous. And so receiuing the Generals ensigne, with the other marks and cognisanes of his honor, causing the drums to be strucken vp, and the trumpets to be ioyfully sounded, he cheerfully prepared himselfe for that his so great an expedition; expecting but the comming of his sonne, who at the request of the Venetians, was gone forth with a fleet of gallies to scoure the Leuant seas of the pirats, who then exceedingly troubled the traffique of the Venetian merchants.

Cicala Bassa maketh shew as if he were vnwilling to be Generall in the wars against the Persians.

C Amiddest which the Turkes so great designes, the Tartar Cham bound for his pay to serue the great Turke in his warres against the Christians, by his embassadour excused himselfe vnto the great Sultan, for that he could not himselfe in person come this yeare with his forces into HVNGARIE, by reason that hee was otherwise necessarily busied with the most vrgent affaires of his owne estate: yet promising withall in stead of himselfe, to send his sonne with a good power of men. Now whereas many men maruell, why the Tartar Cham, being so great a prince, and not much in danger vnto the Turke, being separated from him by the blacke or Euxine sea, should bee still so readie at the Turkes call, to doe him seruice in his warres. The causes thereof are diuers, and those not farre to seeke: First, their neere affinitie

The reasons why the Tartar Cham is so ready to serue the great Turke in his wars against the Christians.

D (as both descended from the same beginning) by often mariages still confirmed: then, their likenesse of manners and condition, no small bonds of loue and friendship: And thirdly, for that the Turkish empire, for want of heires males of the Othoman familie, is assured, and as it were entailed vnto the Tartar Cham: But most of all, for the yearely pention and great pay which hee, being a bare prince, receiueth from the Turkes; his rude and needie people being also euer readie, in hope of the spoyle, to follow him into these warres. But this his excuse for not comming himselfe this yeare into HVNGARIE, being by the great Sultan accepted of, Hassan Bassa resolued vpon his expedition for HVNGARIE, made great preparation for the good successe of the warre there, gaue great hope thereof vnto the great Sultan, and caused himselfe to be proclaimed Lieutenant Generall of all the great Sultans

E forces against the Christians: euerie man affoording vnto these good hopes, a thousand wishes for his health and welfare: but especially the Mahometane priestes assured him of their helpe, so that he would not faile to doe the vttermost of his endeauour against the Christians their enemies. For why, the Turkes doe account him the best and most zealous man, which can do the Christians most harme. And so with these so great acclamations of ioy and honour, Hassan the great Bassa set forward with his armie from CONSTANTINOPLE toward HVNGARIE.

The Christian emperour not ignorant of all these the Turkes great preparations and hawtie designes, sought by all meanes how to resist them, sparing nothing that might any way

Maximilian the Archduke sent embassador frō the emperor vnto the Pope, to craue his aid against the Turk.

F serue or stand him in stead to that purpose. Experience had assured him of the Popes readinesse in contributing to this action what in his power was, hauing before receiued so many testimonies of his good wil: which caused him now to dispatch also his brother Maximilian the Archduke, a good and a deuout prince vnto him, with expresse charge in the emperors name to yeeld all submission vnto his Holinesse, to moue him to relieue the wofull estate of his distressed affaires. Maximilian setting forward about this businesse, arriued at VENICE, where

hee was by that ſtate right honourably entertained. From VENICE hee trauelling towards G
ROME, and with a great retinue approaching the citie, was there met by a great number of noblemen with their followers, ſent from the Pope, and ſo by them with great honour was brought into the Vaticane palace, to the intent that ſo hee might the oftner, and with more eaſe haue acceſſe vnto the Pope, who then lay there ſicke of the gout. The next day he being brought vnto the Popes preſence, & after vſuall reuerence done, hauing audience giuen him, in the preſence of all the Cardinals, he began to deliuer vnto him the cauſes of his comming, which (as hee ſaid) were two. Firſt, to put his Holineſſe in remembrance of the manifeſt perill and danger which hung ouer the heads of the Chriſtians in generall, from the Turke, but eſpecially ouer them of ITALIE, being ſo neere vnto the Turkiſh empire, and a great gappe layed open for the Turkes thereinto to enter, by the way of CANISIA, the key of STIRIA. H
And then in the Emperours behalfe to requeſt him, to ſtretch forth his helping hand againſt this his mortall enemie, who was now drawing all his power together into one head, to deſtroy him; hauing certaine vnderſtanding of the great preparation by him made throughout all his dominions, to thruſt him out of his, if in theſe extremities he were not relieued by ſuch princes as could not in the end themſelues auoyd the laſt violences of theſe harmes, whereof he felt the firſt aſſaults. Which his Holineſſe conſidering in the zeale of his deuotion, and by the encreaſing of the danger, hee was in hope to find of it the like aſſiſtance in this his ſecond need, that hee had before receiued in his former affaires: the precious balme of his deuout charitie being of greater vertue than to ſerue but for one time, but being of ſufficient power to ſerue for all ages, and all times of neceſſitie. And that therefore hee beſought his I Holineſſe to applie the ſame vpon the preſent wound, ſeeing that without his helpe hee was more like to periſh than to liue. Whereunto the Pope anſwered, That his former actions alreadie paſſed, ſpake ynough for him in this action, to manifeſt his deuout meaning, ſo that it was needleſſe for him to vſe further words to expreſſe the ſame. That the great ſupplies both of men and mony, which he had ſent forth for the good of the Chriſtian commonweale, were the ſure teſtimonies of his carefulneſſe for the ſame. And albeit that theſe euill haps had ſo far preuailed in HVNGARIE, yet that he for his part neuertheleſſe had ſtil done what he might for the remedying of thoſe ſo great euils. And that now by the aduice of his honorable Counſellors there preſent, he had appointed an hundred and fiftie thouſand crownes to be paid, toward the maintenance of the chriſtian armie in HVNGARIE this yere) in hope to do more than K that afterward for the Emperour, in his warres againſt the Turks: whom God had (as he ſaid) ſuffered to preuaile vpon the Chriſtians, nor for any goodneſſe that was in them, but for the chaſtiſing of the wickedneſſe of the Chriſtians themſelues.

The Popes anſwer vnto the emperours demaunds.

Which ſumme of an hundred and fiftie thouſand crowns was afterward according to a decree made by the Pope & Cardinals, leuied and paid of the tenths of the Clergie throughout all ITALIE. And ſo Maximilian the Archduke moſt magnificently feaſted and entertained by the Pope, and by him rewarded with foure thouſand crowns, hauing well diſpatched the buſineſſe he came for, returned againe vnto the Emperor his brother.

But as the Chriſtian Emperour was thus carefull about his prouiſions for the withſtanding of the Turkes, they were not any whit behind him in augmenting of their forces for the inuading of him. And now the Tartars in great number being about to come vnto their aid into L HVNGARIE, being denied paſſage by the Polonians, had turned head towards VALACHIA, with a purpoſe by force and ſtrong hand to get that of theſe weake people, which the power of the ſtronger had embarred them off. And ſo preſuming vpon their number, they entred into the ſame prouince, which they all ouer rifled and ſpoiled at their pleaſure. Where ſuch of the countrey people as could eſcape their furie, fled into the townes, leauing their goods behind them vnto their mercileſſe rage, not with any thing to bee ſatisfied. Radulph the Vayuod himſelfe as a man with furie diſmaied, fled to CRONSTAT to George Baſta: where he conſidering the danger he was now in, and that hee was ſtill to expect the like, ſo often as the Tartars were for the ſeruice of the Turke to come into HVNGARIE: before Baſta tooke a new oath of M allegeance vnto the emperor, ſolemnly proteſting to die and liue in his ſeruice, neceſſitie now enforcing him to acknowledge his dutie, and to ſeeke for the remedie of his harmes which he had before oftentimes moſt proudly reiected. Vpon which his ſo humble ſubmiſſion Baſta receiued him and his countrey into his protection.

A In the meane time two traitours were brought to CLAVDIOPLE, who hauing by wonderfull craft ſurpriſed a ſtrong caſtle belonging vnto a certain great ladie, a widow, neere vnto a burrough called CARASEBE, and rifled and ſacked the ſame, traiterouſly afterward ſold it vnto the Turkes, to the great hurt of the emperours ſubiects neere vnto the place, and the no leſſe aduantage of the Turkes. Wherof the Haiduckes hauing gotten vnderſtanding, and cunning in ſuch matters, vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed the Turkes by the way, as they were comming to haue taken poſſeſſion of the place: who ſeeing themſelues too weake to withſtand their enemies, and out of hope to ſaue themſelues by flight, were there as men diſmaied, and appointed to the ſlaughter, moſt of them by the Haiducks cut in pieces, and the reſt taken priſoners. The two traitors being according to their deſerts, for their ſhamefull treacherie, moſt cruelly put to death, to the terrour of others.

The Turkes ſurpriſed by the Haiduckes.

B The Haiduckes hauing no houſes but the fields, nor other trade but their armes, ſpoiled of the one by the Turkes, and armed with the other by neceſſitie, are alwayes in readineſſe for ſeruice. In hope of profit, it is to them a pleaſure to paſſe ouer the mountaines of yce, to trauell through the ſtormes of thunder and lightning, to ſwim ouer the deepe riuers, and to thruſt themſelues into a thouſand dangers: which as it is no commendable kind of life, ſo is the practiſe of it vniuſt. For as in this, ſo in other their actions, they ſpare neither friend nor foe, all that comes in their way being ſubiect, and as it were, appointed to their furie: but eſpecially when they want their pay, which affoordeth vnto them a thouſand excuſes, for the robbing & ſpoiling of all men without reſpect. With which manner of furie they were euen

C at this time enraged for want of their pay, in ſuch ſort, as that if their right hands ſpoiled the Turks, their left hands robbed the chriſtians: as vpon one & the ſelfeſame day, they took from the Turkes of AGRIA, a number of beaſts and cattell, and rifled diuers villages of the Chriſtians. And not content with theſe outrages, meeting with an hundred, or ſix ſcore wagons, laded with great ſtore of victuals, going toward ALBA IVLIA, conducted by the Zeclers, ſet vpon them, ſlew them that driue them, and carried away the wagons with them. But theſe wrongs by Chriſtians done vnto Chriſtians, euen the mortall enemies of the Chriſtians, the Turkes themſelues, reuenged. For the Turkes of TEMESVVAR hauing beene abroad toward LIPPA, and found good ſtore of bootie, meeting with theſe ſharkers, were by them charged, not ſo much for that they were their enemies, or for the zeale of Chriſtianitie, or for the de-

D ſire of honour, as for to haue had from them their prey and bootie. But the Turkes being in number twice as many as they, and withall well acquainted with ſuch buſineſſe, were not ſo eaſily to be ſpoyled; but knowing their owne ſtrength, with their number, oppreſſed their enemies, moſt of whom they ſlew, and tooke the reſt priſoners. God being as iuſt in his puniſhments, as hee is in his workes powerfull, puniſhing the wicked, by the weapons of others as wicked, or rather worſe than they.

The Turkes in the meane time, whileſt things thus paſſed, began againe to fall to their old practiſe, for the ſoliciting of a peace: but ſuch fantaſies were too ſtale and common for them any more to deceiue the Chriſtians with: howbeit that they yet gaue ſome eare thereunto, to diſcouer in their policie the commodities and inconueniences of the peace by them in

The Turkes in their hearts meaning war, make ſhew as if they were deſirous of peace.

E ſhew offered, with a thouſand proteſtations in words, but farre differing from their thoughts and deeds: who during the time of the parley laboured in what they might to benefit themſelues, and to hurt vs. For euen in that ſame very time they fortified their townes and caſtles with men and victuals, but eſpecially the citie of BVDA, whereinto by a conuoy of three thouſand Turkes come from BELGRADE, they put an exceeding quantitie of all ſort of neceſſary prouiſion, ſufficient to ſerue the ſame for an whole yeare. Beſides that, it was certainly known by certaine Turkes taken priſoners, and brought to POSCONIVM, that all this parley and treatie of peace, was but of purpoſe fained to put the Chriſtians in ſecuritie, for that the Baſſa of BVDA, who was the chiefe publiſher of the ſame, had no ſuch commiſſion from the great Sultan, for the concluding of any peace in the abſence of the Viſier Baſſa, vnto whom the grand

F Seigniour had giuen charge, not to make any peace with the emperour, but vpon condition, That he ſhould firſt deliuer vnto him the citie of STRIGONIVM: which if he would not yeeld, that then he ſhould beſiege it, and by force take it from him; and after the winning thereof, to refuſe all other treatie of peace, it being the onely cauſe for which the Turkes deſired peace. Of all which their double dealing, and craftie deſigns, the emperor vnderſtanding, and wholly ly reſolued for war, preſently ſent Countie Sultze with commiſſion to VIENNA, and appointed George Baſta Lieutenant Generall of his armie in HVNGARIE; aduiſing them carefully to looke to their charge, and not too much to truſt vnto the gloſing and flattering ſpeeches of the Turkes. G

The caſtle of Reouin ſurpriſed by the Haiducks

The Haiduckes in the meane time, alwaies in armes, as hauing no other inheritance whereon to liue, ceaſed not ſtill to looke abroad, to find that was neuer loſt. Now, it fortuned them in roaming abroad toward BELGRADE, to light vpon REOVIN, a ſtrong and faire caſtle of the Turkes, wherein 800 of the Turkes ſouldiours, and other of their countrey people had their abode, together with the greateſt part of their ſubſtance. In the ſtrength of which caſtle the Turks truſting, and there lying in ſecuritie, without farther care of their ſafetie, were vpon the ſudden, before they were aware, by theſe aduenturous men ſurpriſed, who, for haſt thruſting one another forward, at length caried the place, ſlew the greateſt part of the Turks, and taking the reſt priſoners, with a great and rich bootie returned to LIPPA. The like exploit they of the garriſon of CANISIA attempted vpon the caſtle and burrough of LAMBAC, which they tooke, and ſpoyled, and afterwards ſet it on fire: The flame whereof ſerued for a ſignall vnto the troupes of Countie Serin, which paſſing that way, and lighting vpon the Turks ouerloded with the ſpoiles they had there taken, cut them in pieces, and ſo recouered from them the bootie. H

Petrinia in danger to haue been betraied vnto the Turke.

About this time certaine of the garriſon ſouldiours of PETRINIA, hauing ſecretly conſpired with the Turkes (by whom they were before corrupted) to deliuer vnto them that ſtrong caſtle: and being about to haue betraied the ſame by a myne which they were in making vnder a ſtable, neere vnto a ſtore-houſe wherein the powder for for the ſtore of the caſtle lay, with a purpoſe by firing of the ſame to haue giuen the Turkes entrance by the ruines thereof, who lay cloſe hidden in a wood neere vnto the place; it fortuned this their wicked purpoſe to be perceiued by certain offendors then kept priſoners in the ſame ſtable neere vnto the myne: who hauing diſcouered the traitours whole purpoſe, and in feare to bee burned or blowen vp by the furie of the myne ſo neere vnto them, diſcouered the ſame vnto the goaler, who made the Gouernour therewith acquainted, by whoſe commaundement they were forthwith apprehended, and being conuicted of their ſo foule a treaſon, were with exemplarie puniſhment executed. I

Now, as the Turkes had oftentimes made ſhew as if they had beene deſirous of peace, ſo ceaſed they not yet with great earneſtneſſe to ſolicite the ſame: ſo that the emperor although he knew it to be a thing rather to be wiſhed than hoped for, yet leaſt he ſhould ſeeme careleſſe of the common quiet of his ſubiects and people, and to refuſe ſo great a good ſo oftentimes offered him, now once againe appointed certaine perſonages of great place and authoritie to attend the propoſitions of peace to be on the Turks behalfe propounded. Of which Commiſſioners, Cæſar Gallen Sherife of STRIGONIVM, an Italian, and a man of great experience in matters of State, was one: Whom the Gouernour of STRIGONIVM had of purpoſe ſent to PESTH, to conſider of ſome good meanes for the concluding of the peace, wherof he himſelfe in perſon had laid the firſt foundation, and vnderſtood the Turks demands and pretentions, not much differing from thoſe which they had many times before demanded. Whereof the firſt was, That the Emperour ſhonld for the time to come, well and truely pay vnto the great Sultan and his ſucceſſors, all ſuch tribute as he was wont to pay vnto the Turkiſh emperours his predeceſſors during the time of his leagues with them, and that without any demaund to be thereof made. The ſecond, That the emperour ſhould alwaies haue his embaſſadour leager at the great Sultans court, with honourable preſents, there to ſolicite the continuation of his loue and friendſhip toward the emperor his maſter. The third, That the emperor ſhould deliuer vnto the Turks all the townes & caſtles which he had taken from them either by force or by ſurpriſe, during the time of this warre, together with the countries of TRANSYLVANIA and VALACHIA. Vpon which demaunds granted, they promiſed to ſend a meſſenger vnto the great Sultan, in their names, to intreat him to ſurrender CANISIA vnto the emperour, but not AGRIA, which (as they ſaid) they might in no wiſe deliuer, except they were thereunto by force of armes conſtrained. K

The inſolent & vnreaſonable demands of the Turkes, for the concluding of a peace with the Chriſtians.

The anſwer of the emperours deputies vnto the Turks proud demaunds.

Vnto which their ſo proud and vnreaſonable demaunds the Commiſſioners for the emperour anſwered, That the emperour long before this time had made peace with Sultan Selym, the

A the ſecond of that name, and with Sultan Amurath the third, this Sultan Achmat his predeceſſours. An aſſured peace, ſworne vnto and confirmed by all the iuſt and ſolemne Oathes that could haue beene by any man deſired: and for the more aſſurance thereof, into writing conceiued, and with the moſt authentique ſeales of their Maieſties confirmed: whereby both parties were moſt ſeuerely and ſtraitly forbidden one of them to attempt any thing againſt the other, or to encroach the one of them vpon the other, during the time of ſuch their league: And if ſo bee that contrarie to the tenour thereof, either part ſhould vndertake to ſurpriſe any place belonging to the other, and ſo become maſters thereof, that vpon the leaſt requeſt of the partie ſo wronged, the places ſurpriſed ſhould bee againe forthwith reſtored, as vſurped vpon, contrarie to the publique faith; and the vſurpers to bee ſe-
B uerely for the ſame puniſhed. And that yet the Turkes notwithſtanding thruſting by heaps beyond the barres of this ſo ſtrong and holy a league, had violated and broken the ſame, by ſurpriſing a number of places both in the high and low countreyes of Hvngarie, neuer giuing eare vnto any ſpeech or requeſt that could bee made vnto them for the reſtitution thereof. And yet not ſo contented, had alſo taken a number of places from the Emperour in Sclavonia, betweene the riuers of Culpe and Vnna: which places hee had oftentimes by as iuſt right redemaunded, as they were by vniuſt forces vſurped, before the beginning of theſe warres. Demaunds eſteemed iuſt and reaſonable euen by the Turkes themſelues, and yet for all that altogether reiected by the Great Sultans themſelues: of which their ſo great iniuſtice the Emperour had oftentimes moſt iuſtly complained, and ſo did euen at this
C day, at the feeling of ſuch his hurts and harmes. And that the Emperour hauing by ſo many perfidious dealings made proofe of the vntruſtineſſe of the Graund Seigniour his predeceſſours, what aſſurance then can hee conceiue of his fidelitie? or vpon what foundation of faith can he build the ſure building of peace, ſo much deſired of him? And yet if hee might hope ſo much of the faith of another man, as he is aſſured of his owne iuſt meaning, differing much from that of the Graund Seigniours, which he knew to bee neuer anſwerable vnto his, that he for his part could be well content to embrace the peace; prouided alwayes, That hee might haue Canisia and Agria deliuered vnto him. Or that if they would needs ſtill hold thoſe places, that he likewiſe might in peace hold the places that hee had before woon in that warre, the reaſons being on both ſides alike. And that as concerning Transylvania,
D hee could not deliuer that without betraying of his owne right, and the welfare of that prouince, hauing obtained the ſame as well by agreements and couenants betweene him and the ſonne of the laſt Duke, Iohn, as by the free and voluntarie releaſement which Sigiſmund Bathor, the laſt and immediate prince thereof had not long before made vnto him: for the defence of which his rights, he had ſpent many men, and great ſummes of money, and all for the keeping of that prouince by force of armes, which by ſo good right belonged vnto him. And that for Valachia hee could bee content to yeeld ſome part of his right vnto that prouince, ſo that the Turks ſhould ceaſe from thenceforth to demand of him any yerely tribute, or that he ſhould as of ordinarie duetie ſend his embaſſadours with yearely preſents vnto the grand Seignior, not being able without need, to conſent vnto ſuch a needleſſe ſeruitude: ſee-
E ing that euery prince ought to be at libertie, at his owne choice to ſend his embaſſadours, and not at the appointment of another man.

Which anſwere of the Emperours Commiſſioners ſerued to no other purpoſe, but for the Turkes to laugh and ſport at, how iuſt and reaſonable ſoeuer they were: ſtill preſſing them to yeeld vnto their vnreaſonable demaunds; or elſe threatning to aduertiſe the Great Sultan thereof, who by force would take that from them to their further loſſe, which they refuſed to graunt him by faire meanes, to their owne good. And ſo the Treatie was for that time broken off, without any thing concluded: which cauſed the Gouernour of Strigonivm to retire himſelfe backe againe vnto his charge; yet for all that leauing Cæſar Gallen behinde him, to entertaine it in ſuch ſmall hope as was there-
F of yet left: Who afterwards ſeeing it almoſt deſperate, making a great feaſt vnto certaine of the chiefe of the Turkes of Bvda, and hauing in that meriment drawne from them a promiſe to liue as friendes with them of the garriſon of Presth, and of other places which lay neere vnto that towne, hee retyred himſelfe afterwards vnto Strigonivm alſo.

Short-

The shamefull cowardise of Iagenreuter gouernor of Pesth

Shortly after whose departure Iagenreuter Gouernour of PESTH, notwithstanding the late promises of the Turkes of BVDA, for their liuing by him in peace and amitie; and the assured promise of Cæsar Gallen, at his last departure, for the speedy furnishing of the town both with men and all things else necessary for the defence therof, which he ought with great assurance to haue expected, yet dismaied with the brute of the comming of Hassan Bassa the Turks Generall with his great armie, and that by the strait commandement of the great Sultan, hee was to begin his conquests in HVNGARIE with the winning of PESTH; as a man afraid of his own shadow, thought good betime to prouide for himselfe: and vpon that resolution, hauing yet seene no enemie at all to force him, trussing vp his baggage, the fift of September forsooke the towne, with fiue companies of footmen, and six troupes of horsemen following him: a sufficient number to haue for a time defended the towne, and endured a siege, especially in so strong a place, and so well prouided both of victuals and munition. All which, this most cowardly Gouernour (but vnworthie that name) left together with his honour, for a prey vnto his enemies: hauing yet before his departure out of the towne, caused the principall buildings thereof to be vndermined, and barrels of gunpowder to be laid vnder them, wherewith they were shortly after all ouerthrown, and most part of the towne burnt. But being gone not past halfe a league from the place, he met with foure hundred Haiducks all well armed, whom the Gouernour of STRIGONIVM had sent for the reliefe of PESTH, with a number of boates loaded with corne, munition, & other necessaries of all sorts, for the better assurance of the place, and the performing of the promise before to that end made by the Gouernour of STRIGONIVM: which Hungarian Haiduckes meeting with these dismayed cowards vpon the way, thought it not best to goe any farther, as thinking themselues not able to doe that with their so small a number, which the other durst not to vndertake with their farre greater: and so ioyning themselues with the other fearefull fugitiues, they with them returned to STRIGONIVM, leauing their vessels and munitions vnto their enemies, who immediatly after seized vpon them.

Pesth most shamefully abandoned by the Christians.

Pesth taken by the Turkes,

The next day after the mines hauing taken their effect, the Turks wondring to see so great and terrible a fire in PESTH, which still more and more encreased, there being none that went about to quench it, aduentured to come ouer the riuer from BVDA, and to draw neere vnto the towne now all on a light fire. Which they finding abandoned and forsaken by the Christians, they with great diligence quenched, repaired the ruines of the towne, and so without any losse became masters of the same.

Iagenreuter for his cowardise worthily committed to prison

Iagenreuter the cowardly late Gouernour with his fearefull troups in the meane time comming to STRIGONIVM, and by the Gouernour there examined of the causes of his flight, and of the so shamefull leauing of his charge: and being able to alledge no other cause or reason, but the great brute and report of the Visier Bassaes comming with his armie to besiege the towne, was therefore committed to prison, and there reserued to be afterward iustly punished for his disloyaltie and cowardise.

The Bassa of Buda excuseth himselfe for the taking of Pesth.

The Bassa of BVDA by the cowardise of the Gouernor thus possessed of PESTH, by letters excused himselfe vnto the Gouernour of STRIGONIVM, for the taking thereof, the treatie of peace being not as yet quite broken off: alleaging for himselfe (as the truth was) That he had taken it as a place by the Christians vpon a vaine feare forsaken, & desperatly set on fire, without any such cause giuen them so to doe by the Turkes, or on his behalfe. And farther, offered vnto the Gouernour, if hee so pleased, to deale with him for the exchange of prisoners on both sides taken, offering to exchange one of them for another. And as for the concluding of the peace so oftentimes treated of, and euen yet in hand, that hee for his part was wonderfull desirous that it might be fully concluded and ended, before the arriuall of Hassan the Visier Bassa with his armie in HVNGARIE: for that hee being once come, there would then bee no time amiddest the noyse of so many weapons, and so many men of warre, to talke of peace.

Hassan Bassa commeth into Hungarie.

Hassan the Visier Bassa was now for all that already entred into HVNGARIE, drawing after him a world of men, and was come towards SEXART, for the viewing of which armie the Gouernour of PALLANTVVAR going forth with an hundred horsemen, by euill hap chanced, before he was aware, vpon the sudden to meet with fiue hundred Turks, by the Bassa himselfe likewise sent foorth to discouer the countrey, and the passages thereof: by whom he charged,

and

A and with the multitude of his enemies oppreſſed, was himſelfe taken priſoner, moſt of his men being in that conflict ſlain, ſome few of them that were left aliue by ſpeedie flight hardly eſcaping. Which euill hap on the Chriſtians ſide, was forthwith recompenced with the better ſucceſſe of the Countie Serin, who falling vpon three hundred Turkes neere vnto SIGETH, being in number ſcarce halfe ſo many as they, yet ſet vpon them with ſuch courage, that giuing them no leaſure to conſider of the weakeneſſe of his forces, they were by them ouerthrowne and cut in pieces, before they were well aware of him.

But togither with the time of the yeare, to come vnto the maine point of theſe preſent warres in HVNGARIE, the Turkes finding themſelues out of hope by any capitulations or treaties of peace, to regaine the ſtrong towne of STRIGONIVM out of the hands of the B Chriſtians, were now reſolued to employ the vttermoſt of their forces for the obtaining of the ſame; with a thouſand proteſtations, That if by force of armes and ſtrong hand they ſhould gaine the place, they would neuer more haue peace with the Chriſtians. At which their vaine threats and ſpeeches, the Chriſtians before reſolutely ſet downe for the defending of the place by them ſo much deſired, and well acquainted with their great brags, could not but with ſcorne ſmile, as men nothing therewith diſmayed, nor ſo to be remooued. Neuertheleſſe the Baſſa conſtant in his reſolution for the regaining STRIGONIVM, with all his forces came the eighteenth day of September and layed ſiege vnto it. Now vnto this ſiege Strigonium beſieged by the Turkes. the Turkes, in hope of ſpoyle and bootie, came flocking from all places, as it had been to
C ſome great mart; and the fields in all the countrie thereabout were couered, and ſwarmed with armes, men, horſes, and tents. They encamped neere vnto Charles his hill, taking vp with their tents halfe a league of the countrie round about: and at their firſt comming moſt brauely aduanced their enſignes with their halfe Moones, the armes of their ſtill increaſing empire. Whom the beſieged in this action imitated, brauely aduaunncing their enſignes vpon their wals, as did the Turks in the fields, and further brauing and prouoking them with a thouſand thundering ſhot, diſcharged out of the towne amongſt them. All the walles round about the towne, gliſtered with armes and flames of fire, out of which the deadly bullets flew carrying with them death and terrour into the middeſt of theſe new come enemies, for their welcome. The Turks neuertheleſſe came ſtill reſolutely on, and as men prodigall of their liues euen in the middeſt of ſo many dangers, began to make their approches.
D Vpon whom the Chriſtians with great courage ſallied forth, to diſturbe them in their works, The Chriſtians ſallie forth vpon the Turkes. and ſo for the ſpace of certaine houres hauing had with them an hoat and ſharpe skirmiſh, without any great hurt receiued, retired againe into the towne, leauing vnto their enemies by that they had done, a good teſtimonie of their valour and reſolution. The Turkes for all that lodged themſelues, made their trenches, and ſo encamped before the mount of Saint Thomas, where by the placing of their cannon, they well declared their meaning for the battering of that fort.

Againſt which their deſignes, George Baſta, Lieutenant Generall of the Imperiall armie, The careſull endeuors of Baſſa the Emperours Lieutenant Generall, for the preſeruation of Strigonium. right reſolutly oppoſed himſelfe, hauing neere vnto STRIGONIVM caſt vp a ſtrong fort, well furniſhed with men and great artillerie, from which he greatly annoyed the Turkes with his
E great ordnance, and with the furie thereof enforced them to remooue farther off with their approaches: his armie vpon the riuer of Danubius in the meane time lying betwixt the Iſle of STRIGONIVM, and the old towne of the Raſcians, to keepe the enemie from entring either into the one place or the other.

Countie Sultze Gouernour of the place alſo hauing taken a generall muſter of his men, The comfortable ſpeech of County Sultze Gouernor of Strigonium, to his garriſon. and with comfortable and cheerefull ſpeeches encouraged his ſouldiors, putting them in mind of their duetie, and of the honourableneſſe of the action now in hand, as vndertaken for the maintenance of the Chriſtian religion, for the ſeruice of the emperor, and the ſafegard of their own liues: perſuading them withall, not to put any truſt or confidence in the Turks
F faith, or faire promiſes, conſidering that their weapons were euen yet wet with the bloud of their Chriſtian brethren, moſt perfidiouſly by them of late maſſacred and ſlaine at the taking of ALBA REGALIS: encouraging them alſo with the goodneſſe of their cauſe, with the carefulneſſe of their friends abroad for their reliefe, with the regard of their own valour, and cowardiſe of their barbarous enemies, whoſe onely hope and truſt was in their multitude: and withall comforting them, that holding out but ſome few moneths, the very elements themſelues, and time of the yeare, would as it were fight for them, and affoord them aid, their enemies being not able with their great armie, in the extreamitie of Winter weather, without their irreparable loſſes, to hold the field. And that as for himſelfe, his honour together with his life, were ſo bound vnto his graue and ſepulchre, at the foot of the wals of that place, as that they could not be from the ſame ſeperated; hauing propoſed the glorie of the preſeruation of that place, or elſe of an honourable death, as the end of all his actions, and conſummation of all his hopes. And that therefore he moſt earneſtly beſought them to follow his ſo honourable a purpoſe, in aſſiſting him in that action, ſo much concerning their liues and honour, and wholly depending of their courage and reſolution. And that for teſtimonie of his earneſt deſire to the furthering of this ſeruice, he was willing to depart with a good part of his ſubſtance and treaſure, to be beſtowed vpon them, amiddeſt theſe the trophies of his honour; hauing commanded them to haue certaine months pay paied before hand vnto them, which was accordingly done.

Now the Turkes hauing a purpoſe eaſily to begin the conqueſt of STRIGONIVM by the taking of the ſtrong fort of Saint Thomas, came the foure and twentieth day of September to aſſault and batter the ſame: vpon whom fiue hundred horſemen, and two thouſand footmen ſallying out of the fort, cauſed them, after a ſharpe and bloudie conflict, and not without ſome loſſe on both ſides, to retire backe againe, and to forſake the mount, whereupon they were encamped. But in purſuing of them too farre, they fell into a great ambuſh, before by the Turkes for that purpoſe laied to entrap them; where betwixt them was fought a moſt ſharpe and bloudie fight, the Turkes preſuming vpon their multitude, and the Chriſtians ſtanding vpon their valor and honour. Vntill that in fine, valour by number being oppreſſed, ſeuen hundred of the Turkes being ſlaine, the Chriſtians were enforced to retire, hauing loſt about an hundred of their men, and amongſt them the valiant Countie Caſimir of HOLENLOTH, for whoſe bodie there was a notable fight betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks; not much vnlike vnto that which the Poet Homer deſcribeth, to haue beene fought betwixt the Troianes and the Greekes, for the bodie of Patroclus. Howbeit that at length the Chriſtians being ouercharged with the comming on of the whole armie of the Turkes, were glad (as I ſaid) to retire, and ſo to leaue the dead bodie of the Countie Caſimir in the power of their mercileſſe enemies, who as dogges which reuenge themſelues vpon the ſtones which are caſt at them, being not able to bite the hands of them that threw them, ſo did they vpon the bodie of this gentle Knight, by cutting off his noſe and eares, and afterwards his head. But within ſome few dayes after, this bodie ſo diſfigured was againe deliuered vnto the Chriſtians for a Turke of good account, who was about that time by them taken priſoner. At which time the Turks ſeemed to bee verie deſirous of peace, moſt earneſtly requeſting Countie Fredericke of HOLENLOTH (the ſlaine Counties brother) not to be an hinderer thereof. Howbeit that this was but one of their old practiſes, depending ſtill vpon vnreaſonable conditions, whereof the yeelding vp of STRIGONIVM was one of the chiefeſt, as the place by them moſt deſired.

More than beaſtly cruelties exerciſed by the Turks vpon the dead bodie of Countie Holenloth.

But if this ſiege of the Turks auailed them not againſt the place beſieged, yet was it profitable for them againſt another place by them not attempted, which was the ſtrong towne of HATVVAN, more ſubiect vnto feare, without any danger, than was STRIGONIVM vnto the bullets and batterie of the Turks, with iuſt cauſe of diſtruſt. For the ſouldiors which lay there in garriſon, terrified with the ſiege of STRIGONIVM, and doubting leaſt the Turks leauing that ſiege, ſhould come and beſiege them, truſſing vp their bagge and baggage, the nineteenth of September abandoned the place, and carrying away with them the beſt of the great ordinance, left the reſt altogether with the place, and great ſtore of prouiſion, vnto the enemie, not in hope of any ſuch matter.

Hatwan moſt ſhamefully forſaken by the Chriſtians.

The bruit of the ſiege of STRIGONIVM had called thither all the forces of both parties in HVNGARIE, and the countrie therabouts, on the one ſide for the winning thereof, and on the other for the defence of the ſame. Amonſt others the Countie of TAMBIER, Gouernour of LIPPA, was about to haue gone thither with certaine of his troups to haue aided his General, for the preſeruation of the place. But in the meane time Bethlin Habor, chiefe of the rebels in

TRANSYLVANIA

A TRANSYLVANIA, assisted by Beckheres Bassa with foure thousand Turks entred into the pro- uince to haue made himselfe master thereof vnder the protection of the Turke. Whereof the Countie hauing got knowledge, resolued to goe to meet him, and to encounter him at the verie first enterance of him into the Pouince. This old rebell knowing that George Bassa was by the emperours appointment gone out of the countrie with the best troupes of his horsemen, the greatest strength of the prouince, came on in great securitie, thinking of nothing but of victorie, and of performing his intended exploit, without feare of any to let him: so that casting no further perill, hee was surprised by the Countie, before he was aware, and put to flight. Neither was the fight long betwixt men accustomed to van- B quish, resolutely set downe, and well armed, against men dismayed, halfe naked, and sur- prised. In which conflict aboue a thousand of them being slaine, and a thousand of horses of seruice taken, the rest fled; amongst whom Bethlin himselfe with his Bassa flying, were glad by swimming to saue themselues amiddest a thousand chances and dangers of their liues.

Bethlin Habor the rebel surprised and ouerthrowne by the Countie Tamber.

The Bassa of TEMESVVAR aduertised of this ouerthrow by one of them that was fled from the same, presently he sent forth his Lieutenant with a good number of men, to re- lieue the vanquished Turks: Who by the way vnderstanding of the generall ouerthrow of them whom he was sent forth to relieue, as also of the strength of his enemies, and that hee was come too late to the relieue of his friends, retired as fast as he could with his men backe C againe homeward toward TEMESVVAR. But being in their retreat discouered, and hoatly pur- sued by these men imbrued with the bloud of their enemies, and yet breathing with victoie, they were by them ouertaken euen almost at the gates of their citie, and there (as men before ouercome with feare, and ouerwhelmed with despaire) cut in pieces, without any fight or re- sistance by them made, beseeming men of their sort; the Lieutenant himselfe being there slaine also.

Suctors sent to the rebell by the Bassa of Temeswar, defeated by the countie Tamber, and the Bassa his lieutenant slain

After which exploits done, the Countie turning towards IVLA, chaunced to light vpon certaine companies of Turkes loaded with bootie which they had got in roaming abroad into the countrie thereabout, whom he pursued euen vnto the gates of the towne, which they found shut against them; for that they within the towne seeing the Christians euen D at the heeles of their companions, had shut their gates, neither durst now open the same for feare least the Christians should together with them enter the towne, and so become masters thereof. Who so shut out by their owne friends, were there all by the Christians slaine, euen in the sight of their companions, not daring to let them in, nor able to relieue them. After which massacre done, the Christians not yet so contented, burnt the sub- urbes of the towne, and so loaded with the spoyles of their enemies, departed. The Coun- tie after so many honourable exploits in a small time by him performed, returned to LIPPA, where he arriued the fiue and twentieth of September, and from thence afterward aduertising Bassa the emperors lieutenant generall, of these his exploits done, caused ten of the Turkes ensignes, all stained with their own bloud, to be presented vnto him, as the sure tokens of his E good seruice done.

But to returne againe vnto the siege of STRIGONIVM, the greatest exploit by the Turkes intended for this yeare, from which we haue from the occurrent of the same time a little stra- ied. The Visier Bassa perceiuing by the valiant and resolute defence of our men, how little he preuailed in this siege, and that it was like ynough to tend at length to his dishonour, thought it good once againe to prooue, if he might by composition gaine that which he was now almost out of hope by force to obtaine. And to that purpose caused a motion to bee made vnto the besieged, for a treatie to bee had concerning a peace, and a day appoin- ted for the same. Vnto which motion for peace the Imperials (although they had no hope at all, of any peace to bee concluded) easily yeelded, least they might be thought F obstinately to haue reiected the same. Whereupon Commissioners were on both sides appoynted to meet together, to conferre of the matter. And so for the Emperour Al- them himselfe, with Ferdinand Collonitz, and Fredericke of HOHENLO, Countie of RHENE, were appointed neere vnto the Rascian towne to meete with the Turkes Commissioners, to heare what they would say. Howbeit the Commissioners on both sides being met at the place aforesaid, all their conference was but vaine, and to no purpose; the Turks still vrging the yeelding vp of SZRIGONIVM, and the Imperials as earnestly refusing the same. G So that the treatie for peace being broken off, and the Commissioners departing, the siege was more cruelly by the Turks continued than before.

The Cossacks depart out of the Turks camp vnto the Christian.

Now there were in the Turkes armie lying at the siege, certaine companies of Cossacks, men for their pay indifferent to serue any prince of what religion soeuer. Which seruiceable men, in number 700, had agreed together the 28 of September, by night to forsake the Turkes campe, and to come vnto the Christians. Of which their purpose and designe the Visier Bassa hauing by some vntrustie among them got knowledge, caused the footmen of these companies to be apprehended and slaine; the horsmen in the meane time making themselues way ouer the bellies of such as would haue staied them, fled, and escaped, some of them to KOMARA, and some to DORIS. Threescore of these Cossacks being by the Turks H hardly pursued, aduentured to swim ouer DANVBIVS, and so all naked came to Collonitz, by whom they were courteously entertained and apparelled. And within three dayes after 200 horsemen moe of the same Cossacks came vnto Collonitz also: who marching in good order vnto the head of the Christian campe, were there sworne vnto the Emperours seruice, and in token of their loyaltie there discharged their pistols thrice. Which horsemen Collonitz diuided amongst the rest of his troupes, as hauing before time had good experience of the courage and good seruice of diuers such others of their fellowes.

The reason of the mutinie of the Ianizaries against the Bassa their Generall.

By these fugitiue souldiours it was vnderstood, that the Ianizaries in great number vp in mutinie against the Visier Bassa, would haue enforced him to haue raised the siege, and so to haue departed. The cause of their so great discontentment (as they pretended) was the ma- I nifest and assured danger of their liues, with little or no hope at all for the gaining of the place: They themselues being still exposed to the dangers both of the siege and of the field, hauing the besieged on head of them armed with an assured resolution, and the Christian armie at their backs of knowne valour and experience. Besides that, the place it selfe was (as they said) impregnable, being at all times to be releeued, by reason that it commaunded ouer the DANVBIE, which might alwayes releeue it both with men and victuals. And that therefore, after that they had satisfied their honour, by giuing of an assault or two vnto the fort of S. Thomas, they had resolued to arise, and to be gone. And much about this time; viz. the 29 of September, in the night time, was a most dreadfull fierie impression seene, in fashion much like a Rainebow, of a fierie red colour, which beginning ouer COCKERA, and rising higher K ouer STRIGONIVM, at length vanished away ouer the fort of S. Thomas. The sight whereof much troubled the beholders thereof, as well the Christians as the Turks: such strange meteors and apparitions being oftentimes the presages of the ruine of them to whom they appeare.

In the meane time whilest the Turks thus lay before STRIGONIVM, at the siege of Saint Thomas fort, the lord Basta, Lieutenant Generall of the Emperours forces, to giue the Turks to vnderstand, how that he was alwayes in readinesse to attend vpon their doings, & to take hold of all such opportunities as should by them be offered, & so to keepe them in suspence, came with seuen thousand braue horsemen, and shewed himselfe in the plaine field in order of battell, so, as it were, brauing the Turks euen vnto their owne trenches: where hauing L discharged their pistols thrice, they returned as victorious, alwayes keeping themselues in order, as men readie either to giue or to accept of battell. Howbeit the Turkes for the present keeping themselues close within their trenches, moued not; but afterwards being desirous to counterbraue this the Christians presumption, the third day of October they came forth of their trenches, and gaue a second assault vnto saint Thomas fort, imploying the vttermost of their power in this action, whereupon they well knew a great part both of their honour and of their safetie to depend. But in assaying the fort they met with them as resolutely set downe for the defence thereof, and for the maintenance of their honour, as were they for the winnning of the same. So the assault was begun with great furie and aduenture, as was the other before: howbeit that it endured not long, for that the Turkes fought rather for the M discharge of their dutie, and to haue some iust cause to raise their siege, than for any hope they had to preuaile, or to carrie the place. For it befell them according as they had expected, so that after that the fight had endured little more than halfe an houre, amiddest the tempests of armes and furie, in fine the Turkes out of hope to preuaile, gaue ouer the siege, and retired,

A hauing in that conflict loſt fiue hundred of their beſt ſouldiours.

The Gouernour of STRIGONIVM had in the citie vnder his charge 6000 Haiduckes, who attainted with treaſon and feare, all forſooke the place excepting fiue hundred, preferring their liues, vnworthie the ſauing, before their duetie, and the life and honour of their General. With which ſhamefull treaſon, and the reſolution of the great Baſſa for forcing of the place, the Germaines there left, ſeeing their captains diſmayed, gathered themſelues together, promiſing by their own valour, to ſupplie what wanted by reaſon of the trecherie of the others, offering themſelues to be ſworne againe vnto the ſeruice of the emperour, and rather to dye all in the place, than to yeeld it vp vnto the Turkes, or to leaue it vnto their enemies: where
B by their generall conſent a ſolemne decree was made, That whoſoeuer he were which ſhould ſpeake or once make mention of yeelding the towne, ſhould forthwith therefore be hanged vpon a gibbet. The Turkes although they had now in two aſſaults bin twice repulſed, came yet forth once againe the fift day of October, and aſſaulted ſaint Thomas fort the third time: wherein they failed not to doe what they might, but were by the Chriſtians therein ſo receiued, that deſpairing of the winning thereof, they with great loſſe and ſhame retired. Which diſgrace cauſed them to returne to their old practiſes, for the taking of places by policie. For hauing in many places vndermined the wals, and filled them with gunpowder, they were in hope by that meanes to haue opened themſelues a way vnto their conqueſt. Of which their hope for all that they were deceiued: For the Chriſtians hauing perceiued their meaning, did by countermining not onely fruſtrate their endeauour, but carried away the powder alſo,
C which they had before laied in the mynes, reſeruing it to their owne further neceſſitie and vſe. Wherefore the Turks ſeeing themſelues of their hope deceiued, returned againe vnto their old practiſes, to come to a parley for peace. Of which their motion the Chriſtians nothing diſliked. But the Commiſſioners on both ſides being met together for that purpoſe, in a little Iſland beneath STRIGONIVM, when as the Turkes had offered vnto the Chriſtians the citie of AGRIA for STRIGONIVM: or if ſo bee that that exchange pleaſed them not, but that they would needs keepe the citie of STRIGONIVM ſtill, that then in conſideration of the peace, they ſhould deliuer vnto them the ſtrong townes of FILECK, ſaint SETSCHIN, PALLANKE, and NOVIGRADE; both of which demaunds were verie vnreaſonable. The Commiſſioners thereupon againe departed without concluding of any D thing.

A treatie for peace.

The treatie broken off, and nothing concluded

Now the armie of the Turkes was in it ſelfe diuerſly diuided with quite contrarie deſires, the Viſier Baſſa with ſome other of the Commanders, ſtood ſtifly for the taking of the place, as men willing either to returne from thence with victorie, or elſe there to end their daies: but the Ianizaries to the contrarie, were as earneſt to be gone, and to raiſe the ſiege, deeming it impoſſible as then to preuaile againſt a place ſo ſtrong, ſo well manned, and ſo eaſily to be ſtil relieued. With which their reſolution ſo contrarie vnto his, the Baſſa enraged, and yet propoſing before his departure to proue the vttermoſt of his forces againſt the fort now alreadie by him thrice before aſſaulted, the tenth of October gaue thereunto ſix great aſſaults, but with like ſucceſſe as before, finding there ſtill the ſame defendants, no whit diſcouraged, but armed E with their accuſtomed reſolution. For the defendants encouraged by their moſt valiant commanders, with ſuch furie repulſed the Turks, that they were glad to giue ouer aſſault vpon aſſault, and with great loſſe of their men to retire. Their often retreats alſo being vnto them no leſſe hurtfull than were their aſſaults, the deadly bullets being out of the fort diſcharged vpon them like ſhowers of haile. So that the Baſſa now after ſo many aſſaults, out of all hope to gaine the fort, and ſtill preſſed by the Ianizaries for the raiſing of the ſiege, immediatly after roſe with his armie, quitted his trenches, and retired with his campe neere vnto a caſtle, about a league diſtant from STRIGONIVM. From whence the Turks, the better to couer their diſhonour, and to hinder the Chriſtians from purſuing of them in their retreat, the next day after came into the field with a good part of their armie, and ſhewed themſelues before the Raſ-
F cian towne, and there skirmiſhed with the Chriſtian Haiduckes. Which manner of skirmiſhing for all that was more in ſhew, than in effect, neither partie therein receiuing any great loſſe or hurt. In the meane time, the beſieged which were in STRIGONIVM, hauing gotten certaine knowledge, that the enemie had alreadie remoued his cannon and other prouiſion for the ſiege backe againe into BVDA, in token of ioy diſcharged all their great ordinance them were partakers, as deliuered from some part of the feare which the siege of so great a a citie as was STRIGONIVM, had brought vpon them. And so the siege of STRIGONIVM begun the eighteenth day of September, was by the Turkes giuen ouer, the thirteenth of October: the Ianizaries insolently threatning to haue slaine the great Bassa their Generall, if hee had there any longer stayed.

Bassa pursueth the Turks army departing from the siege of Strigonium.

Bassa, the emperours lieutenant in the meane time awaiting all opportunities, failed not to take hold of so fit an occasion, but with his horsmen following after the Turks armie, slew of them a great number, and tooke some other of them prisoners. And afterward returning vnto their campe, found it void of men, but full of bullets, with certain pieces of great ordnance, H which the Turks had left there, hauing not time to remoue the same to BVDA. Vpon this rising of the Turkes armie, the Commaunders thereof were diuersly affected vnto the seruice that was further to be done, as they had before been in the time of the siege. Such of them as lay in HVNGARIE, or neere thereunto, desiring still to hold the field, in hope of the spoile of the countrey: but they which dwelt further off, especially such as were come out of ASIA, desiring as much to bee discharged, their horses being almost all dead with faintnesse and trauell, and themselues wearie of the seruice.

Shortly after the rising of the Turks army from STRIGONIVM, two fugitiues of the Turks most brauely mounted, came vnto Bassa the emperors lieutenant, and presenting him with a ring of great value, and a most faire Turkish ensigne, told him most part of the Turks armie I to lie then incamped in the countrey neere vnto PESTH; and the great Cham, a yong prince of about twentie yeares old to be come thither with a great power of Tartars, to aid the Bassa:

remedie whereof Sigefride Collonitz opposing himselfe with his Hungarian horsmen, against these insolent forragers, so daunted them, that ceasing further to spoile the countrey, they departed, carrying away with them such prisoners & spoile as they had there taken, and leauing behind them a strong garison of 3000 good soldiors, for the repairing & keeping of PESTH, K

Countie Althem, Gouernour of STRIGONIVM, made a mention for a treatie of peace to bee had for the comfort of the distressed people of that spoyled countrey, solemnly protesting most religiously on his part to keepe the same, if it should bee once concluded: and yet in

New rebellion in Transyluania raised by Istuan, sirnamed Botscay.

But now as this poore countrey began to feele relieue by the departure of the great Bassa with his armie out therof, so the countrey of TRANSYLVANIA ioyning thereunto, was at the same time as much with rebellion & discord distressed. Bethlin Habor the rebell, with his Bas- L sa ouerthrown and driuen out of TRANSYLVANIA (as is aforelaid) the L. Belgiosa, Bassa his lieutenant in this prouince, thinking all things now at quiet, was making himselfe ready with his troups, to haue gone to aid the L. Bassa his generall, then encamped in the plains of STRI-GONIVM, to hinder the Turkes designes for the taking of this towne. But as he was about so to haue done, behold euen at the same time when he least feared, a second rebell there started vp, far worse than the first, namely the lord Istuan (otherwise surnamed Botscay, or more tru-

Turke, and stiling himselfe by the name of the prince of TRANSYLVANIA, entring that pro-distant from VERADIN, and meaning thither to assemble togither his armie, hee sent to Petsie Gouernour of VERADIN, to put him in mind of his dutie, and to craue his aid. Which valiant captaine, alwaies prest and readie to do his prince seruice, failed not now of his dutie, but cal-

With this armie Belgioſa marched againſt the rebels, who as reſolute men attended his comming: for why, Botſcay knowing the Haiducks of Countie Tambier ſecretly to fauour him and his rebellion more than they did Belgioſa and his iuſt quarrels; ſtood in no feare of them, but aſſured himſelfe of them as of his friends; who failed not of his hope and expectation, but euen at the firſt ioyning of the battaile turned themſelues to his
B part: with the going ouer of whom, the number of the rebels was much encreaſed, and Belgioſa his power both in force and courage much weakened, ſeeing themſelues at once expoſed both vnto the force of their enemies & to the trecherie of their fellowes, who now with conioyned forces moſt fiercely aſſailed them: who finding theſelues now on all ſides enuironed with ſo great a multitude, and not able with ſo ſmall a number as was left to withſtand the violence of their enemies, & the treaſon of their companions, after they had to the vttermoſt of their power performed all the parts of valiant and couragious men, were there almoſt all cut in pieces, and there buried in the field of their loyaltie, honoured with their own bloud, and altogether embrued with the bloud of their enemies. In this vnluckie and diſloyall fight were diuers good and faithful captains ſlaine: Petſie Gouernor of VERADIN, and Pallas Lipa,
C both great captains, and grieuouſly wounded, were there taken priſoners. The Lieutenant of Petſie alſo hauing retyred himſelfe with ſome of his troupes into a place of good ſtrength, there ſo valiantly defended themſelues, that Botſcay out of hope to ouercome them by force, to get them into his power, promiſed them vpon his oath, if they would yeeld themſelues, to ſuffer them in ſafetie to depart. But what truſt or credit is to be giuen vnto him, who hath before broken his faith and loyaltie to his prince, this rebell well ſhewed by the death of theſe valiant and warlike men, who after that they had vpon his faith and promiſe yeelded themſelues, were by his appointment cruelly ſlaine and cut in pieces. The Sileſian horſemen were there alſo all ouerthrown and buried in the middeſt of their enemies: and as for Belgioſa himſelfe, he ſtrangely eſcaped out of the battaile, and ſaued himſelfe by flying to VERADIN. The Botſcay dealeth vnfaithfully with ſuch as vpon his faith giuen vnto him, yeelded vnto him.

This victorie gotten, together with the humble ſubmiſſion of Botſcay, obtained of the great Sultan, That from thenceforth he ſhould be ſtiled by the name of the Prince of TRANSYLVANIA, with a further charge from him, to doe the vttermoſt of his endeuour for the ſubduing vnto his obeyſance the reſt of TRANSYLVANIA, promiſing plentifully to ſupplie his wants both with men and money, and out of hand to ſend him three thouſand Tartars to his aid. And indeed this was a very great and bloudie battaile, fought from the firſt breake
E of the day vntill eleuen a clocke at noone: but whether ſo many were ſlaine there, or no, it cannot certainly be told, for that diuers of them who were ſaid to be ſlaine and ſo accounted among the dead, had hid themſelnes in the wood thereby, and ſome others of them by ſome other meanes eſcaped death alſo. Petſie himſelfe had with him when he was taken two Monkes, whom the ſouldiors in deſpight cut into many pieces, and carried him faſt bound in chaines to DERRITZA, to be there cured of the dangerous wounds by him in the battaile receiued.

But as for Pallas Lippa, who being wounded, was taken priſoner with Petſie, he was afterwards by Botſcay appointed his Lieutenant Generall, & ſo by his commandement was publickly proclaimed; as he which was deſirous to take vpon him the defence of the reformed
F religion, and of ſuch as were willing to profeſſe the ſame: who forthwith made a generall proclamation, That all they which were deſirous of the libertie of conſcience, & to liue free from the ſuperſtitions of the Romiſh Church, ſhould repaire vnto him as vnto their head and chiefetaine, readie to entertaine them, and to allow to euery one of them fiue dollars a moneth for their pay. Vpon which proclamation made, a great multitude of men vpon the ſuddaine reſorted vnto him; ſo that in a ſhort time he had following of him tenne thouſand

Pallas Lippa, Botſcay his lieutenant, pretendeth the defence of religion for the ſtrengthning of Boſcay in his rebellion.

Hai-

Haiduckes, beside a number of other of the common rascall people: yea, almost all the gen- G tlemen of the country repairing vnto him, bound themselues by oath to him, and one of them to another, That as they would not take vp armes to fight against the Christian Emperour, so they would not submit themselues vnto the Turke, but onely stand vpon the defence of their religion and the libertie of conscience.

The rebell Botscay thus wonderfully encreased in strength and number, beset almost all the passages of the country, and with the sword of rebellion in his hand, and his souldiors following him, commaunded the cities still as he went to yeeld vnto him: but, hearing that Belgiosa was after the late ouerthrow gone from VERADIN to CASSOVIA, where his wife lay, and being come thither, to haue been by the citizens reiected, who would not onely not receiue him into their citie, but turned his wife also out of the citie vnto him, hee with a great armie com- H ming thither, tooke the citie without resistance, the citizens for the most part enclining vnto him: Of which citie being possessed, hee foorthwith changed both the Religion and ciuile gouernment thereof, slew part of such as were of the Romish religion, and thrust the rest out of the citie, with all the Church-men, tooke the Bishop and the Emperours Treasurour prisoners, and so changed the whole gouernment of the towne vp-side downe. The onely man hee stood in feare of, was Belgiosa, for whom hee laid wait by all meanes he could to haue taken him, with a purpose to haue vsed him most hardly, if hee had fallen into his hands.

These things thus done in TRANSYLVANIA and in HVNGARIE, the Visier Bassa being about to returne to CONSTANTINOPLE, to grace that little which hee had done I this yeare in HVNGARIE, and to auoyd the suspition of his euill successe in that prouince, borrowed of Botscay the rest of the ensignes, together with Petsie and other the noble Christian captiues which hee had taken in the late battaile with Belgiosa: which ensignes and prisoners hee confidently afterwards caused to bee presented vnto the Great Sultan Achmat, as taken by himselfe, and in recompence thereof, left three thousand Turkes and Tartars with the rebell, to ayd him in his warres both in TRANSILVANIA, and HVNGARIE.

An impudent shift of the Visier Bassa for the sauing of his credit with the Great Sultan.

Bassa the Emperours Lieutenant in HVNGARIE, and Gouernour of TRANSYLVANIA, hearing of the stirres and troubles of late raised in both those countreys by Botscay and his rebellious followers, and hauing as hee thought best set all things in order againe at K STRIGONIVM, marched thence with his armie, being fourteene thousand strong, toward CASSOVIA, with a purpose to haue suppressed the rebellion in the vpper HVNGARIE, before it should haue spread farther, to the endangering of the whole estate of both those countries, as afterward it did. Howbeit, before hee could come thither, the rebels after the taking of CASSOVIA being wonderfully encreased both in strength and number, had taken in most of the strong townes and places in the vpper HVNGARIE, the people almost generally now fauouring their quarrell, carrying with it the face of religion, with the suppressing of the Germane gouernment, both things vnto them much pleasing. And now hearing that Belgiosa, a man of them most hated, being (as wee said) shut out of CASSOVIA, was fled into the castle of ZIPZE, they by letters required of Turson, captaine of the castle, to L haue him deliuered vnto them, to bee according to his deserts punished; promising withall, to doe Turson himselfe no harme, so that hee would take part with them in the defence of their religion, and of the libertie of conscience: which if hee should refuse to doe, yet that they would giue him free libertie to depart whither hee would out of his castle, and in safetie to conduct him thither, so that hee would foorthwith resolue what course he would take: But if hee should of this his offer mislike also, then they threatned to spoyle his countrey, to kill his people, to raze his Castle, and to make himselfe an example vnto others. Wherewith for all that hee nothing mooued, refused to deliuer vnto them Belgiosa, the man whome they so much desired, or yet to accept of any of their other offers. Whereupon the rebels with great labour repairing the broken way betwixt CASSOVIA and the castle, and bringing certaine peeces of great ordnance from CASSOVIA, in great number came and straitly besieged the castle. With whose attemps the valiant captaine nothing mooued, with his thundering shot out of the castle so welcommed them, that hauing thereby receiued great harme, they thought it not their best course to stay any longer there M

But while the rebels thus lay at the ſiege of this caſtle, certaine companies of them went to haue taken the ſpoile of a religious houſe there by: but comming thither, and breaking open the dores, and ſearching euery ſecret corner of the houſe, they found therein nothing worth the reckoning of, but ſo returned almoſt emptie handed: for the prieſts had for feare of them before carried away with them all the beſt of their goods and ſubſtance into the beſieged ca-

to keepe the field with his armie in ſo vnſeaſonable a time of the yeare, and ſo to maintaine warre as it were both againſt his enemies, and the extremities of nature, ſought by letters to haue reclaimed them of CASSOVIA againe vnto their allegeance, offering vnto them pardon for all their offences paſt, ſo that they would now at laſt acknowledge their fault, and receiue into their towne a garriſon of the Emperours. To which purpoſe he writ alſo to them of EPERIA, in hope that if he might ſo haue gained thoſe two ſtrong townes, to haue in them wintered in ſafetie with his armie. But they of CASSOVIA hauing in the citie a ſtrong garriſon of 6000 good ſouldiours, and out of feare to be by Baſta beſieged at that time of the yeare, and withall in hope (if need were) to be by Botſcay relieued, who was then reported to be 40000 ſtrong, vtterly refuſed to hearken vnto Baſta his motion for their reconciliation, or at all to ſubmit themſelues againe vnto the emperour: Which cauſed him with his armie to come neerer vnto the citie, yet ſtill ſeeking rather by faire meanes to haue perſuaded the citizens to haue returned vnto their loyaltie, than by force to haue conſtrained them. But finding them obſtinately ſet downe, and by no perſuaſions to be remoued, but with their great ordnance in what they might to trouble his campe, hee ſent before the Countie Hohenloh and Rotuitz with part of his armie to EPERIA, to command them vpon their allegeance to receiue the Emperours ſouldiors into the citie, and to relieue them with ſuch things as they were able; and within a few dayes after, viz. the fifth of December, followed himſelfe with the reſt of his army. But being come thither, after much talke had with the chiefe men of the citie, it was at length contrary to all mens expectation agreed, That Baſta aſſuring them of the free exerciſe of their religion, of the good behauiour of the ſouldiors towards them, and to defend them from the iniurie and incurſions of their enemies, they ſhould open their gates vnto the Imperials, and relieue them with what they were able, and ſo as before to continue in their allegeance and obedience vnto the emperour. Of all which things when Baſta had vpon his faith giuen aſſured them, they opened their gates, and receiued in the ſouldiors: vnto whom (now almoſt dead and ſtarued with hunger) nothing could haue happened more comfortable or welcome. LEVSTA, BARBELD, and ZEBENA, famous townes in thoſe places, following the example of EPERIA, ſubmitted themſelues in like manner, and helped Baſta his ſouldiors with reliefe. Thither with great danger came vnto Baſta, Sigefrid Collonitz, a man of great power and authoritie in that part of HVNGARIE, to conferre with him about the appeaſing of theſe troubles: who afterward by his letters vnto the States and the reſt of the nobilitie of HVNGARIE, yea, and to Botſcay himſelfe, in vaine perſuaded them to lay downe armes, and to returne againe vnto their wonted obedience vnto the Emperour.

The citizens of Caſſouia refuſe to ſubmit themſelues, and to receiue emperours ſouldiors into their citie.

Eperia yeelded vnto Baſta.

There had bin hitherto in the imperiall camp great ſcarcitie of victuals and of other neceſſaries, ſo that for want thereof, and for the extremitie of the cold, and other miſeries, it was greatly feared leaſt the campe ſhould haue bin broken vp, to the irreparable loſſe of his imperiall maieſtie, as the ſtate of things then ſtood in HVNGARIE.) For the remedie whereof, 30 waggons loaded with money and cloth were ſent from VIENNA vnder the conduct of Countie Solmes, Colonell Starenberg, the Treaſurer, and others: vnto whom Tanhuſar ioyned 1500 Huſſars (Hungarian horſemen ſo called) to ſtrengthen the conuoy againſt the danger which was feared from the Haiducks which lay vpon the way, and who indeed were now roming about and ſeeking after bootie in euery corner of the countrey. Which Huſſars being come with the reſt of the conuoy into a thicke wood, about two miles from FILEK like enemies ſet vpon the waggoners, whom they ſhould haue conducted, and there made a great ſlaughter of ſuch as were about to reſiſt them, inſomuch that the Countie Solmes had much adoe to ſaue himſelfe, and to get out of their hands, leauing the waggons as a prey vnto the treacherous Huſſars, who now become maſters of them, draue them away to Botſcay the rebels campe; Tanhuſar their captaine in vaine purſuing after them (with ſuch of his Huſſars, as more faithfull than the reſt, had no hand in that ſo foule a treacherie) and recouering nothing but tenne waggons loaded with cloth, which the traitors had left behind them, hauing taken the horſes out of them, and put them into the other waggons wherin the money was (which was reported to bee 130000 florens) with the more ſpeed to bring them vnto Botſcay: Who hauing vpon the ſudden receiued ſo great a ſumme of money, by him not looked for, foorthwith diuided the ſame amongſt his ſouldiours, the more to encourage them in their rebellion againſt the Emperour.

The Huſſars traiterouſly ſpoyle them whom they ſhould haue conducted.

The

A The newes of this ſo great a loſſe being quickly ſpred thorow all the Emperours campe, at the firſt filled the ſouldiors with griefe and diſdaine againſt the treacherous Huſſars, but afterwards with wrath and indignation againſt their owne commaunders, as deeming it to haue bin nothing but a falſe report by them deuiſed and giuen out to deceiue them, & to feed them with a vaine hope. Which perſuaſion, though not true, had now ſo ſtrongly poſſeſſed their minds, as that they were about all to haue riſen vp in mutiny, and to haue forſaken the ſeruice to the vtter perill of their captaines, & endangering of the whole prouince, now vpon point to haue beene for euer loſt. All which miſchiefes Baſta foreſeeing, did firſt what hee might with words & faire promiſes to haue appeaſed them: which not ſeruing, he with certain thouſands of duckats and waggons of cloth taken vp at Levsta and other townes there by, wiſely con-
B tented them, in ſome good meaſure furniſhing the old ſoldiors, before halfe naked, both with money and apparell, the ſouldiors greateſt contentments.

Which mutinie ſo againe appeaſed, the imperials ſhortly after ſurpriſing a caſtle not farre from Eperia, found therein a great many of Hungarian Gentlemen, whom they caried away with them priſoners, to learne of them what they might concerning the rebels proceedings, and further deſignes. In the meane time the Haiduckes on the other ſide beſieged the caſtle of Sendra, which they after many aſſaults tooke and put to the ſword all the garriſon ſouldiors therin; and departing thence, firſt rifled & after burnt the towne of Filek. They alſo took the caſtles of Bolvar, Setschin, Dregel, Bvrac, Holloc, Blavenstein, and the ſtrong ca-
C ſtle of Cabragetia, whither they of Hatvvan not long before had caried their great ordnance at ſuch time as they for feare of the Turks, then lying at the ſiege of Strigonivm, had abandoned the place: all ſtrong holds in the vpper Hvngarie. After the taking of which places, Ferentius Radius, and Charles Iſtuan (Botſcay his neere kinſman, and the chiefe captaines and ringleaders of the rebels) exacted contribution money of the mine rall townes (as they call them) belonging vnto the Emperor in the vpper Hvngarie, but eſpecially of the citie of Nevvsoll, enforcing them alſo to ſweare to be in all things obedient to Botſcay, & to take his part againſt the Imperials, threatning with fire and ſword to infeſt ſuch places as ſhould refuſe to doe the like. And to the intent that they ſhould not by Collonitz bee incouraged or defended, who to that end was comming thither, the rebels in great number went to meet him, and hauing belayed all the paſſages, enforced him to retire himſelfe vnto his caſtle of Lebentsia; where hee

Collonitz prayeth aid from Vienna.

Now while Baſta thus lay with his armie at Eperia and in the countrey thereabout, he daily receiued great harme from the Haiduckes, who were ſtill houering about him, as hawkes ouer their prey; his ſouldiors, by neceſſitie enforced to fetch in wood, and other things neceſſarie into the campe, being ſtill moſt miſerably ſlaine and cut in pieces: yea, they were ſo
E bold, as oftentimes to trouble him in his campe, and to aſſaile his ſouldiors where they lay quartered in their trenches; as amongſt other times, they did in the latter end of December, to end the yeare withall: at which time they by night breaking into the quarter where Charles Collonitz, with Copell and Pettinger, two captaines of Avstria, with their companies lay, they ſlew the ſaid Copell, with almoſt all his ſouldiours, and burnt Pettinger in his tent, Collonitz himſelfe being at the ſame time in great danger, and hardly by them beſet alſo; vntill that encouraging his men, by performing all the parts both of a good captaine and valiant ſouldiour, hee by true valour enforced them at length to retyre backe againe into the woods, from whence they came, hauing in this conflict ſlaine foureteene of them with his owne hand.

F About this time was a ſpie taken in the Imperiall campe, one of Botſcay his chiefe men, diſcouered by one comming from Cassovia to Eperia which knew him: who by Baſta his commaundement apprehended, and vpon torture examined, and confeſſing what hee had done, was for his good ſeruice hanged and afterward quartered, to the terrour of others attempting the like.

The Turks this yeare were not much fortunate in their warres: Hassan the Visier Bassa and G their Generall against the Christians in HVNGARIE hauing in vaine (as is before declared) besieged STRIGONIVM, and with all his forces done nothing worth the remembrance; and Ci-

by the Persian king ouerthrowne and put to flight, and the citie of BABYLON, now called BAG-DAT taken: and was first at PRAGE the two and twentieth of October reported by the Secretarie of the Vayuod of VALACHIA, sent thither in embassage from his master vnto the Emperor, and afterward confirmed by an embassador sent from the Persian king himselfe vnto the Emperour, who hauing audience, told his maiestie, how that the king his master was not igyet that mooued with the zeale which one prince ought to haue to the reliefe of another, hee had taken vp armes against him, so to auert some part of that heauie warre from his maiestie euen vpon himselfe: and that he had already obtained many great and notable victories and conquestes against him, and recouered a great territorie, wrongfully before taken from the Persian kings his predecessors by the Turkish Sultans: and that now he was of nothing more desirous, than to ioyne in a perpetuall league and amitie with his Maiestie, that so in a most strong confederation combined together, they might neuer afterward be disseuered, or euer make peace with the Sultan, without one anothers knowledge and consent. And further, That for his part hee was minded neuer to giue ouer the warre so happily by him begun, vntill hee had driuen him euen into his imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, so that his ma- I iestie would on his part doe the like, by continuing of his present warres; it being not possible for the Turke to hold out against them both, and the onely meanes to abate his great-nesse, and to assure them in their estates: requesting him withall, to send backe with him some graue man, his embassadour, with sufficient authoritie and instructions to conferre about these matters with him; that so knowing and vnderstanding one anothers mind, the league and confederation betwixt them might the more easily and commodiously bee made and concluded.

The Turkes troubled with ciuill warres. Neither were the Turkes busied with these forraine warres only, against these so great and mightie princes, in places so remote and farre off, but vnto these were ioyned their owne intestine and ciuill warres and troubles also; the rebels being yet vp in the lesser ASIA, and the K Bassaes of ALEPPO and DAMASCO, two of the most famous cities in SIRIA, and both of them men of great place and command, of late vp in armes one of them against the other: insomuch, that they had brought the matter to be tried by the sword in the plaine field, where the Bassa of ALEPPO in a great and bloodie battell ouercome, and flying vnto his owne citie, was by the Bassa of DAMASCO pursued hither, and so straitly by him besieged with an armie of 30000 men, that in fine he was glad to reconcile himself vnto him, and to make his peace, by yeelding vnto whatsoeuer the other Bassa his enemie pleased to demaund of him; as being thereunto driuen by the extremitie of famine, which then reigned in the citie; as also for that he had lost a great number of his men, whom he had sent secretly out of the citie to seeke for victuals, being all slaine by the Bassa of DAMASCO his souldiors. With which so great matters L the Bassaes of the Court (who had the managing of the State vnder the young Sultan) were much troubled, he himselfe (as was fittest for his yeares) in the meane time delighting himselfe Sultan Achmat his first sonne borne. with the pleasures of the Court, and much reioycing at the birth of his first begotten sonne, who was about that time borne.

1605 The reuolution of time had now thus brought this yeare to an end, the troubles of HVNGA-Ciuill discord the ruine of Hungarie. RIE and TRANSYLVANIA yet still more and more so encreasing, as if that those most miserable countries had by the iust and heauie iudgements of God beene now appointed vnto their last and vtter ruine and destruction: the causes of their so great miseries proceeding not so much from the Turks their enemies, as from the natural inhabitants themselues; who in minds diuided both in religion and affection, some of them continuing in their allegeance vnto the em- M Belioiosa author of the great rebellion in Hungarie. perour, and other some following the ensignes of the rebell Botscay, did both vnto themselues and to their country more harme in a little time, than had the Turks in many yeres before. Of which so dangerous a dissention, and of the harmes therof ensuing, Belioiosa left by Basta as his Lieutenant, was reported to haue been the first and chiefe authour: For whereas the yeare before

A before the biſhops and other Clergie men, in an aſſembly of them at POSSONIVM, had without the knowledge of the Nobilitie and States of HVNGARIE, publiſhed a decree by them there made, for the burning, or perpetuall baniſhing of all ſuch as were of the reformed religion in HVNGARIE: and that the States of that kingdome vnderſtanding thereof, and ſolemnly proteſting againſt the ſame vnder the ſeale of the Lo. Palatine, had publikely affirmed, with iuſt armes to defend themſelues, if they ſhould for their religion be called into queſtion, or troubled: and had againe repeated the ſame their proteſtation at GALSET. Yet Belioioſa neuertheleſſe in the meane time by cunning ſeizing vpon the reformed churches at CASSOVIA, would not ſuffer the citizens of the reformed religion there, to haue any ſermons in their own
B priuat houſes, or ſo much as to read on the holy Bible. Neither any whit moued with the former proteſtations of the Nobilitie and States, had taken vnto himſelfe all the lands & goods of them of the religion in CASSOVIA, not ſuffering them to burie the bodies of their dead within the citie, neere vnto the Monaſteries. And requeſting to haue borrowed of Botſcay certaine thouſands of crownes, and thereof by him denied, cauſed his ſouldiours to ranſack two of his caſtles, and to ſpoyle him of all the wealth and treaſure he therein had. For which indignities and iniuries Botſcay enraged, cauſed open proclamation to bee made, That hee would giue vnto euerie Haiducke that would ſerue him, foure crownes a moneth pay, with all the bootie that they could get. Whereupon ſix thouſand Haiduckes, which then ſerued vnder Belioioſa, forthwith reuoulted vnto Botſcay, their number encreaſing daily. But after that vnto this extraordinarie pay, Pallas Lippa, his lieutenant, had alſo ioined the protection of the C reformed religion, it is wonderfull to ſay, how the Haiducks by heaps reſorted vnto him, and how the people in all parts of HVNGARIE generally fauoured him and his quarel, being in all places whereas he came, readie to ioine hands with him againſt the Imperials. The Turks and Tartars alſo, both with men and money furthering him in all his doings, whoſe helpe he refuſed not. Whereof proceeded all the aforeſaid miſeries both in HVNGARIE and TRANSYLVANIA, with many other worſe than they, which together with the beginning of this yeare tooke their beginning and encreaſe alſo. Vnto which ſo great troubles ſtill more & more encreaſing, Baſta not able by force to giue remedie, ſought by lenitie & faire perſuaſions to haue eaſed the ſame: by letters oftentimes aduiſing euen Botſcay the chief rebel himſelfe, to change his mind, to lay downe armes, to diſband his forces, & to perſuade with the reſt of his ſeditiD ous followers, to ſubmit themſelues vnto the Emperor, and to return againe vnto their wonted obedience. Wherunto he at length anſwered, That if the gouernment of all TRANSYLVANIA might be left vnto himſelfe alone: if a naturall Hungarian born might be ſtil choſen Lieutenant Generall in HVNGARIE: if none but ſuch as were Hungarians borne ſhould haue the gouernment and command of all the garriſons in HVNGARIE: if the Wallon and French ſouldiours might be ſhut out of HVNGARIE: if the naturall Hungarians borne, might from thenceforth be regarded and prouided of their pay: if it might be lawfull for euery man to haue the free exerciſe of his religion: if the authors of theſe troubles might be deliuered vnto the Hungarians to be puniſhed: if the Emperour himſelfe in perſon ſhould come and be preſent at the parliament at PRESBVRG: if the Germane garriſon ſoldiors ſhould ſtill keepe
E themſelues within the places wherunto they were appointed, without making of any excurcurſions into the towns or villages neere vnto them, or hurting of the poore countrie men: he could then be content to come to ſuch a good agreement for peace. With which offer he ſent two of the rebels, his followers, vnto Baſta, who not liking thereof, returned them backe againe, without concluding of any thing.

Botſcay his vnreaſonable demaunds for to come to a peace.

But while things were thus in talke, ſome of the Haiduckes in the meane time with a number of Tartars ioyned vnto them, in ſeeking after bootie ſurpriſed GOKARA, a towne ouer againſt STRIGONIVM: where hauing ſlaine certaine Germanes which had the keeping of the place, and rifled the towne, as they were about to haue ſet it on fire, by the comming ouer of the Gouernour of STRIGONIVM, with his garriſon, they were enforced to forſake the place,
F and againe to retire. This loſſe receiued at GOKARA, was againe by our men requited by the taking of PALANTVVAR, a good fortreſſe of the Turkes, after a long and cruell fight taken by captaine Bathian (commander of the Imperiall troups on this ſide of the riuer of Danubius:) whereinto a number of the Turkes being retired, were there together with the garriſon ſouldiours all ſlaine, and amongſt them diuers men of great account, who but ſome few dayes before were come thither. Which fortreſſe the captain cauſed to be forthwith raſed, becauſe it ſhould no more ſtand the Turkes in ſtead for the annoying of the Chriſtians. G

Vacia moſt ſhamefully by the Haiducks betrayed, and deliuered vnto the Turkes.

The Turkes about this time had a purpoſe to beſiege VACIA, a citie not farre from VICEGRADE on the other ſide of DANVBIVS, a place which ſtill did them great harme, and ſtood the Chriſtians in great ſtead. The garriſon of which place was part Germans, part Hungarians, as the reſt of all the garriſons in the Imperiall townes of HVNGARY were. Of which the Turks purpoſe for the ſiege, the treacherous Haiduckes there in garriſon hauing got vnderſtanding, conſpired to deliuer vnto them the place: and yet not ſo contented, to joyne thereunto a treaſon more bloudie and treacherous, than was the betraying of the towne: For finding themſelues by far too ſtrong for the Germanes in garriſon in the towne with them, they H fell vpon them, fearing no ſuch matter, and ſlew moſt part of them, the reſt ſauing themſelues by ſpeedie flight to STRIGONIVM: and ſo afterward according to their former pretended treaſon, deliuered the towne vnto the Turks, joyning with them & the Tartars, and directing them for the more eaſie ſpoyling of the Chriſtians, and the countrey thereabout.

The taking of this citie of VACIA had in ſhort time called together great numbers of the Turkes and Tartars out of all places of the realme: who together with the Haiduckes made a great and puiſſant armie, to the terrour of the Chriſtians, not then able to hold the field againſt them, and the encouraging of the Turkes, thus holpen euen by the Chriſtians themſelues, to the deſtroying of one another. With this armie they turned from VACIA to GOKARA, with a purpoſe from thence to haue paſſed ouer the DANVBIVS, vpon the yce, and to haue I ſurpriſed STRIGONIVM. Which exploit they had once before attempted againſt the baſe towne, being then by the Chriſtians repulſed, and beaten back with their great and ſmal ſhot out of the towne, as now they were againe. Howbeit, that ſeeing the number of their enemies daily more and more to encreaſe, they in STRIGONIVM ſtood more in doubt of a ſecond ſiege, than they had done of the firſt, whereof we haue before ſpoken.

Strigonium in vain attempted to haue beene ſurpriſed by the Turkes and the Haiduckes.

The report of theſe ſo great troubles, and of the generall reuolt of the diſcontented Haiduckes in HVNGARIE, much troubled and grieued the Chriſtian Emperour: Who both in reſpect of his honour, and of the ſafetie of his eſtate, raiſed what power hee might out of his prouinces thereabout, and leuied great ſummes of money from his ſubiects, taking a ducat vpon euery houſe in AVSTRIA, being then in great feare of theſe miſeries and miſchiefes ſo K faſt ſpreading, and ſtill more and more encreaſing, and approaching that way. Vnto whoſe forces already on foot, had the aid promiſed from the king of SPAINE, the Pope, the Princes of ITALIE and GERMANIE, with 6000 footmen, and 2000 horſe, out of BOHEMIA, been in time joyned, they might haue made a ſufficient armie vnder the conduct of Baſta, the Emperours lieutenant, to haue repreſſed both the attempts of the enemie, and the inſolencie of the rebellious Haiduckes. All or moſt part of which aid, this yeare failing, and Baſta with his ſmall forces much weakened with wants and the extreamitie of Winter, and not able to keepe the field; the enemies ſtill increaſing both in number and in ſtrength, and without feare of any to encounter them, at their pleaſure roming vp and down, began now to draw neer vnto VICEGRADE (a good and ſtrong towne of HVNGARIE, ſtanding vpon the ſide of DANVBIVS, about L the midway betwixt BVDA and STRIGONIVM) with a purpoſe to haue beſieged the ſame. Of whoſe comming the Germans there in garriſon hearing, and warned by the treacherie of the Haiduckes of VACIA, what to feare from the Haiducks in garriſon with them in VICEGRADE, betime retired themſelues out of the towne into the caſtle. In which doing they were wel aduiſed, being otherwiſe like enough to haue run the ſame fortune that the Germanes their fellowes before had done at VACIA. For the Turks with the rebelliour Haiducks were no ſooner come thither, but that the Haiducks in the towne, without more ado, opened the gates of the towne vnto them, as vnto their friends, directing them in beſt ſort they could both for the beſieging and winning of the caſtle. Which while the Turkes hardly beſieged, and the Germanes therein notably defended, Haſſan the Viſier Baſſa, together with Begedes Baſſa, to perſuade them to yeeld vp the caſtle, writ vnto them in this ſort. M

But the Germanes harkening not vnto theſe letters, as men reſolued, valiantly ſtood vpon the defence of themſelues, and of the place, vntill that by extreame neceſſitie forced thereunto, they yeelded the ſame by compoſition.

Baſta in the meane time with his forces much diminiſhed, lying at Epperia, and in the countrey thereabout, ſeeing the generall reuolt of the Haiduckes, of late the Emperours greateſt ſtrength in Hvngarie, and Botſcay the rebels ſtrength daily to encreaſe more and more; with no poſſibilitie for himſelfe with ſuch ſmall forces as hee then had, to repreſſe the rebels inſolencie, or to remedie theſe ſo farre ſpreading euils, but for want of greater ſtrength hee muſt
C lye ſtill as it were a man beſieged, was therewith exceedingly grieued, and as it were almoſt ouerwhelmed with the heauie burthen of ſo many great miſeries at once beſetting him. To threaten without power he knew to be but folly, and to ſpeake faire to be but vaine. Neuertheleſſe hauing procured from the Emperour a generall pardon, for all ſuch as hauing taken part with the rebels, were willing to returne againe to their allegeance: hee to aſſure all them whom it might concerne, of the Emperours gracious fauor, and to put them all out of feare, cauſed letters of generall pardon to be publiſhed, for all men to take knowledge of: the purport whereof was this.

Baſta perplexed, publiſheth a generall pardon vnto the rebels.

ſo great grace from the Emperor and vs; vnto all men made knowne by theſe preſents,

This Proclamation ſolemnely by Baſta publiſhed with the ſound of many drummes and trumpets, the ſixteenth of Ianuarie, and ten dayes libertie giuen for ſuch as would to come in, and againe ſubmit themſelues; diuers gentlemen of the countrie neere vnto EPERIA, where Baſta with his armie lay, for feare of being ſpoiled, came in, and accepted of the grace offered: other of the ſeditious, dwelling farther off, little or nothing at all regarding the ſame. In ſo much, that the rebels in number daily encreaſing, and the rebellion ſtill farther and farther ſpreading, Botſcay was now growne ſo ſtrong, that hee diſmiſſed from him moſt part of the Turks, whoſe ſeruice he had in all theſe troubles hitherto vſed; reſeruing yet certaine H Ianizaries, whom he mingled with the garriſon of Haiduckes, which he had put into CASSOVIA.

Pallas Lippa Botſcay his lieutenant by his commandement beheaded.

Pallas Lippa before by Botſcay taken priſoner, and vpon his reuolt from the Emperour by Botſcay made his Lieutenant Generall, and a great man amongſt the rebels (as is before declared) was now of many thought to be a moſt fortunat and happie man. But in the middeſt of ſuch his happineſſe, and the greatneſſe of his command, he was by the malice of ſome, enuying at his eſtate, accuſed to Botſcay, as if he had had a purpoſe to haue made him away; and deliuering the ſtrong citie of CASSOVIA vnto Baſta, to haue gone ouer againe vnto the Emperor, and to haue followed his enſignes. Vpon which ſuſpition he was by the commandment of Botſcay beheaded, with fiue other men mo, of good place, ſuſpected to haue bin partakers I of the conſpiracie with Lippa. In whoſe treaſure, after that he was executed, were found an hundred thouſand Hungarian duckats, with ſeuen hundred chains of gold; all which he had ſcraped together in that ſmall time wherein he had bin Botſcay his lieutenant amongſt the rebels. With which mony Botſcay in his rebellion confirmed, became therein more obſtinat and furious than before; not admitting any talke with Baſta, concerning peace, but vpon ſuch vnreaſonable conditions, as beſt ſtood with his owne good liking.

Now long and tedious it were to proſecute euery particular exploit, with the diuers wofull euents thereof, during this ſo great and dangerous a rebellion in HVNGARIE: which how heauie ſo euer they were for the poore Chriſtians there dwelling, to endure, as tending all to the ruine and deſtruction both of themſelues and of their countrie (ſometime one of K the moſt flouriſhing kingdomes of Chriſtendome, but now become as it were a large Theatre, for all the world to behold moſt wofull tragedies, and bloudie maſſacres acted in) yet for all that vnto ſome nothing is pleaſing, but what is written of the greateſt actions; as of great and bloudie battels, of the conqueſts of whole kingdomes, and the ruine of moſt mightie and famous princes; all other things elſe being vnto them tedious. In ſome part to eaſe them of ſuch wearineſſe, and to pleaſe their appetites, I will briefly paſſe ouer, and euen lightly touch ſuch things as for the moſt part of this yere paſſed in this troubleſome countrie, not ſtaying but vpon matters of greateſt weight and importance. The Haiduckes ſtill proceeding in their rebellion, in the beginning of Februarie beſieged the caſtle of SACMAR, a place verie fit for their purpoſe: which caſtle the ſouldiours there in garriſon doubting to bee able L to hold againſt them (being not paſt threeſcore ſound men left in it) & deſtitute alſo of their neceſſarie prouiſion, couenanting to haue their liues ſpared, at length yeelded vnto them. But in going thence, meeting with certaine other companies of Haiduckes neere vnto TOKAY, they were by them moſt part of them ſlaine, ſome few of them by ſpeedie flight eſcaping. The ſame Haiduckes which had taken SACMAR, immediatly after attempted to haue ſurpriſed the towne and caſtle of TOKAY alſo: But the Gouernour of the place in good time aduertiſed of their intent and purpoſe, cauſed the yce wherewith the riuer was hard frozen, to be broken fortie paces ouer, neere vnto the caſtle, and the ſame to be lightly couered ouer with ſtraw. Whither the Haiducks comming by night, and finding the yce on the other ſide M the riuer, whereunto they firſt came, ſtrong ynough to beare them, by heaps thruſting one another forward, to haue ſcaled the caſtle, the yce breaking vnder them, they there together by heaps moſt miſerably periſhed, many of the reſt which eſcaped that danger, being with ſhot out of the caſtle ſlaine alſo. In this caſtle was no great ſtore of victuals: whereof Baſta vnderſtanding, with his armie marched from EPERIA toward BODAC, a towne holden by the rebels,

The caſtle of Sacmar yeelded to the Haiducks

Tokay in vaine attempted to haue bin ſurpriſed by the Haiduckes.

A rebels, in hope with the ſpoile thereof to haue relieued TOKAY. But the rebels hearing of his comming, hauing themſelues burnt the town, had got themſelues with that they had, into the caſtle, and from thence with their great ordnance ſo welcomed Baſta at his comming, that diſappointed of his purpoſe, and hauing loſt ſome of his men, he was glad with all ſpeed (not hauing ſtayed aboue foure houres) to return againe to EPERIA: certain of the nobilitie of that countrie, which tooke part with the rebels, being reported, in his abſence, to haue made a road towards EPERIA, to the endangering of that citie. In which his returne towards EPERIA, the troups of counte Turon, and of Charles Collonitz, by chance lighting vpon 500 Haiducks in a countrie village, ſet the ſame on fire, and therein burnt moſt of the ſaid rebels, and ſlew the reſt of them that remained, in ſeeking by flight to haue ſaued themſelues.

B In the meane time one of the great men amongſt the Turkes, came to CASSOVIA, bringing with him a great ſumme of mony; which being diuided amongſt the rebels there, much confirmed them, both in their rebellion, and deuotion towards the Turks: which rebellion they ſpared not for any coſt by all meanes to maintaine, as more preuailing thereby, than by the greateſt forces they could vſe for the conquering of HVNGARIE. The Turks with mony maintain the rebellion in Hungarie.

But Baſta was no ſooner with his armie returned againe to EPERIA, but that the ſouldiours generally exclaiming, and calling vpon him for their pay, were about in a mutiny to haue forſaken him. For the appeaſing of which tumult, he was glad preſently to make what ſhift hee could for mony, wherewith he in ſome meaſure gaue them contentment, and ſo with much ado agreed with them for ſix weekes ſeruice longer: thereby deliuering the citizens of EPE- Baſta his ſouldiors in mutinie for their pay.

C RIA from a great feare, wherein they were, for being ſpoiled by thoſe mutinous ſouldiors, of whom they ſtood in no leſſe doubt than they did of their enemies.

And now the ſeditious Haiducks after their wonted maner ſtil roaming vp and down the vpper part of HVNGARIE, the ſecond day of March, about ſeuen of the clock in the morning came to NEVVSOLL, a faire citie in that countrie, and there by many reaſons perſuading the citizens to reuolt, and to take part with them, had parley with them vntill it was full twelue of the clocke, but drawing ſtill neerer and neerer vnto the towne. In ſo much that Turbelius Gouernor of the place, perceiuing a yeelding inclination in the citizens, and doubting without their helpe to be able to defend ſo great a citie againſt the Haiducks, with ſo weake a garriſon as he then had therein, he with his Caſſockes, for his more ſafetie, retired himſelfe into the ca- Newſoll ſurpriſed by the Haiducks, & again recouered from them.

D ſtle. Which done, the Hhiduckes forthwith breaking into the citie with ſix companies ſummoned the caſtle, requiring to haue it deliuered vnto them. Of whom Turbelius ſlew diuers with ſhot out of the caſtle: and the ſame day in the euening couragiouſly ſallying out of the caſtle, with certaine companies of harquebuſiers, driue the Haiduckes againe out of the citie; which he afterward better fortified againſt their like attempts. And the next day vnderſtanding by a countrie man, That certain companies of Haiducks and Turks together, were comming to TVRTZO, a towne not far off, carrying with them a great number of cattell, women, and children, which they had got out of the countrie townes and villages thereabout: he preſently ſent forth his lieutenant againſt them, with his Coſſackes (a deſperat kind of horſmen) who meeting with theſe Haiduckes and Turks, ſlew of them about 150, and reco-

E uered from them all the captiues, the cattell, with 200 horſes, and a mule loaded with 4000 Hungarian duckats.

Now had FILEK (a moſt beautifull caſtle, and as it were the key of that part of the vpper HVNGARIE, which the Chriſtian Emperor yet held againſt the Turks) for certain months bin hardly beſieged by the Haiducks: which although it was ſo well ſtored with victuals, and other neceſſarie prouiſion, as that it might haue holden out three moneths longer ſiege, yet the ſouldiors there in garriſon, for want of water, were enforced now at length to yeeld the ſame. For the keeping of which caſtle Redeius Ferentſius, captain of the Haiducks which had woon it, placed therein a garriſon, part Haiducks, part Turks: as not daring to truſt either of them alone; the Haiducks for feare of their treacherie, nor the Turks, for that he knew them Filek yeelded vnto the Haiducks.

F to be deſirous of the place, for the commodious ſituation thereof, as giuing them a way to enter farther into the territories of the Chriſtians: which Redeius, though a rebell, would not yet in any ſort grant them.

This caſtle of FILEK ſo (as is beforeſaid) beſieged, the valiant Collonitz had ofttimes in vaine ſought to haue relieued; all the waies being ſo beſet, and as it were, fortified with the infinite number of the Turks, Tartars, and rebels, as that there was no comming vnto it: and G moſt part of his owne ſouldiours being Haiduckes alſo, to whom he durſt not well truſt, for feare of being betraied by them. Concerning which matters he ſhortly after writing to a certaine nobleman, after that he had ſhewed vnto him, That hee deſired nothing more of the Emperour, than to be diſcharged of his ſeruice; he thus breaketh forth.

The letters of Colloritz to a certaine nobleman, concerning the troubles raiſed by the rebels in Hungarie.

I cannot (ſaith hee) any more performe faithfull ſeruice vnto the Emperour: for beeing attended vpon with very traitours, I am enforced to hazard euen mine honeſt reputation. I would willinglie ſerue with German horſemen; and I could alſo wiſh, three thouſand Caſſockes and two thouſand Polonian Huſſars to be againe raiſed; who would doe notable ſeruice in purſuing of the enemie: but H ſeuerie moneth they muſt needes haue their wages paied them. The number of the enemie encreaſeth dailie; and their ſtrength ſtill more and more: ſo that things cannot be in worſe ſtate than now they are. All deuiſes are directed to the hurt of the Emperour: neither is there any place quiet. What courage I am of, which haue loſt all my wealth and ſubſtance, is eaſie for any man to iudge: all which, for all that, I could conceale, and diſſemble, ſo that I might faithfully, and according to my deſire, ſerue the Emperour: which for all that is not poſſible for me to doe without a ſufficient ſtrength of Germane ſouldiours. But this of all doth moſt comfort mee, for that I know mee to haue done my dutie; for otherwiſe this miſchiefe had ſpread further. Many were in hope that I would rather haue reuolted from the Emperour, then haue loſt my goods: and ſome there were which doubted not to ſay ſo of me. The enemies are now in my Dukedome of CLEVE, and there made ſpoyle of all. SETCHIN, IARMETA, I

Strong townes & places by the Turkes and rebels taken in the vpper Hungarie.

TREGLA, PALANKA, SAMOSCHIN, BLAVENSTEIN, RABENSTEIN, VACIA, REGIOMONT, DILLENA, PVGANTZA, TABRA, LIBETNA, SITNA, DIBINA, SACMARIA, SENDRA, ONOTH, DISGIORA, ZATNAR, CALO, SCHAROSPOTAC, BVDNOC, NAGIBANA, FILEK, and almoſt all TRANSYLVANIA, are now ſubiect to the rebels: ſo that what will enſue thereof, except they ſpeedilie be confronted, euery man may right eaſily gueſſe.

Now if Collonitz one of the greateſt and beſt Commaunders of the Emperours forces againſt the Turkes in HVNGARIE, was thus beſet, and ſpoyled of his ſubſtance, by the rebels, as hee in theſe his letters complaineth, and as indeed he was, hauing at one time receiued from them ſo great harme, as was deemed to haue amounted to an hundred thouſand K ducats; and not daring to truſt his owne Hungarian ſouldiours, whoſe hearts hee knew to be with the rebels: In what ſtate may the reſt of the people of that diſtreſſed Prouince, bee thought to haue beene, being at the ſame time expoſed vnto the ſame rebels as a prey and ſpoyle, and their countrey layed open for the Turkes and Tartars to forrage and ouerrun at their pleaſure.

Wiolaſe in vain attempted to haue beene ſurpriſed by the Haiduckes.

But in briefe, to run along with the Haiducks, foure thouſand of them attempting to haue ſurpriſed WIOLASE, were ſo from thence repulſed, as that many of them being there ſlaine, fiue & thirty wagons were ſcarce ſufficient to cary the reſt of the wounded ouer the mountaines, of whom an hundred died by the way. But going from thence, they brake into Turſon his countrey: where they hauing rifled all the townes and villages, commaunded all the L
States of the countrey, within three daies next after, to ſubmit themſelues to Botſcay, and to ſweare vnto him fealtie; or otherwiſe to expect all extreamities: Who with feare diſmaied, all promiſed to ſubmit themſelues vnto Redeius, Botſcay his lieutenant.

Now for remedie of theſe euils, Napragius and Forgatius, two graue counſellors, were ſent in the Emperours name, to entreat of peace with Botſcay: who the ſeuen and twentieth of March departing from EPERIA, with foureſcore harquebuſiers towards CASSOVIA, before they came thither, ſent before them an herauld, to aduertiſe Botſcay of their comming. Which meſſenger, ſo ſoone as hee was come into CASSOVIA, the Turkes ſo ſtraitly kept, as that no man might ſpeake with him but Botſcay himſelfe; and not he alſo, but in open place, and that in the hearing of the Turkes. Who at his firſt meeting with him, told him, That if the embaſſadours from whom he came, were ſent from the Nobilitie and States of HVNGARIE, they ſhould be right welcome vnto him, and haue audience: but if they came from the Emperour, as had Rogatſius and Ciaccius before ſent from Baſta, they ſhould then ſpare their labour, and come no farther: for that all matters had with him been often ynough talked vpon; it being now more than time, that things ſo often conſulted vpon, ſhould bee no more

A talked of, but indeed performed. Which messenger returning vnto the embassadours, told them what Botscay had said, and that the Haiduckes had in CASSOVIA built a bulwarke of a wonderfull height, beset the gates with strong gards, and so filled the trenches with souldiors, that a man could hardly enter into the citie; howbeit, that euery man might safely come and goe thither about his trade and businesse. He told them also, how that Botscay his Lieutenant had called together all the gouernours of the places thereabout, and aduised them for the space of fourteene daies to beware of the excursions of the Haiducks, and in the meane time, for their more safetie, to bring their wiues and children, with such other things as they made most reckoning of, into the citie, for that he could not as yet (as hee said) represse and
B gouerne the vnruly and headstrong Haiducks, being yet in their rage and fury, as the manner of the discontented multitude is. Of which Haiducks, some going forth toward NEVVHVSE, and bringing home a great bootie of cattell, were by Collonitz and Trautmanstorf, pursuing them with their horsemen, ouerthrowne, and all the bootie againe recouered.

Botscay about this time, viz. the nine and twentieth day of March, summoned all the Nobilitie and States of HVNGARY vnto an assembly, to be holden at SERENTIVM the seuenteenth day of Aprill, writing vnto them in this sort.

Botscay his letters to the Nobility & States of Hungarie, to call them together to Serents.

You know (said hee) right worthie and valiant men, into what extreame miseries our afflicted
C countrey (all the ancient priuiledges and immunities thereof being contemned and troden vnder foot) is by the comming in of strangers brought: whose insolencie is gone so farre, that wee cannot onely not quietlie possesse our own goods, but so much as enioy the libertie of our owne consciences. For which cause the Nobilitie of the whole Kingdome being the last yeere sent in embassie, and as it were foreseeing what was to come, the assembly of the Empire being ended, openly protested before the whole Imperiall Diet, and by their letters oftentimes declared, that they should of necessity be at length enforced to take vpon themselues the defence of their priuiledges and of their religion: by which their protestation for all that they so little preuailed, that forthwith after, such an intollerable Edict was by the Emperours commandement published, as had exposed vs all and euery one of vs to most certaine death, had we not betime prouided for our selues: all which things are vnto you all most certainely knowne, both by the vnlawfull acts themselues, and the whole proceeding of the Prouost Generall. All which things considered, you met together at GALEST, and from thence againe openly signified vnto the aforesaid
D Prouost Generall (vnto whom his Imperiall Maiesty had committed the shedding of our bloud, the abolishing of our Priuiledges and Religion, VIZ. the execution of this cruell Edict) That if he proceeded to goe forward in that businesse, you would put into execution what you had before publikely protested in the generall assembly of the whole Empire at PRESBVRG. But what answer you receiued from him, for as much as it is not vnto any of you vnknowne, it is not needfull heere to rehearse. Wherfore when as hee going about the execution of the aforesaid Edict did in forcible manner with certaine peeces of great ordnance impugne the armie of his Imperiall Maiesty, both in his and our dread Lord and Soueraigne, and by force tooke from vs some of our castles, and besieged some others; we found no other remedie against these so great euils, but that which God himselfe euen then shewed vnto vs; which was, by force of armes to defend our selues so farre as we might. In which our purpose seeing that the grace
E of God, and the good successe which we haue hitherto had, will vs to continue, although we haue suffred no little harme from the Germanes and Haiduckes (which for all that is for the recouering of the libertie of our countrey patiently to be borne) to the intent that we vnited with other our brethren through HVNGARIE, may the better withstand our enemies and fight against them; it is most necessary that we should meet together, and all matters set apart, enter into consultation, how hereafter to resist our enemies, and set our countrey in peace and quietnesse. Wherefore seeing that we haue determined to hold an assembly at SERENTS the 17 day of Aprill, we by these presents warne and request you all, there at the aforesaid 17 day of Aprill to make your personall appearance, to ioyne in amitie with vs, and after the name of God called vpon, to consult and conclude vpon such things as may be both acceptable and pleasing vnto God, and most profitable and necessary for the good of our afflicted countrey in generall. But if there shall be any which vpon a presumptuous or careless contempt shall not at the time appointed come, nor seeme to regard such things as so much concerne the common good and welfare of F their natiue countrey, let them assuredly know both themselues to be therefore to be accounted for enemies vnto their countrey, and their goods also so to be disposed of as shall vnto the Nobilitie and States then and there assembled be thought meet and conuenient.

Much

A great tumult and fire in Constantinople.

Much about this time a great tumult was raiſed amongſt the Ianizaries and other ſouldiours of the court at CONSTANTINOPLE, at which time a great fire aroſe alſo in the citie (as oft times the like hath before done through the inſolencie of the Ianizaries, who in ſuch confuſion of mens mindes vſe to make their owne gaines) wherein many both men and women periſhed, with aboue 500 ſhops and warehouſes full of rich marchandize, moſt part whereof belonged vnto the Iewes; of whom, almoſt 200 are ſaid to haue been there burnt; the deformitie and ſpoile made by which fire in the citie remaining euen yet to be ſeene. Theſe troubles brought a great feare vpon the young Sultan, who firſt therewith halfe diſmayed, and ſeeing the like to ariſe in PERA alſo on the other ſide of the hauen, about a mile off from the Seraglio, could not otherwiſe thinke but that the ſouldiours were about ſome dangerous treaſon. Which ſuſpition two meſſengers but a little before come from Cicala Baſſa encreaſed: who by the ſame meſſengers deſired new ſupplies to be forthwith ſent vnto him; proteſting, that for as much as he had not long before, in a great battell loſt a number of his men, if he were not with new ſuppies ſpeedily relieued, he muſt of force retire, and leaue all vnto the Perſian. Howbeit the fire quenched, and the Ianizaries and other ſouldiours with the ſpoyle they had of the loſſes of others gotten ſatisfied, the tumult was without much adoe againe quieted.

The Emperors ſouldiours in mutinie for their pay, threaten their Generall, and ſpoile the country betwixt Eperia and Presburg.

Now beſide the aforeſaid troubles from the rebels in TRANSYLVANIA and the vpper HVNGARIE, that nothing might be wanting vnto the miſerie of thoſe ſo miſerable countries, the Emperors ſouldiors which ſerued vnder Baſta hauing of long from day to day in vaine expected their pay, and ſeeing neither pay nor other reliefe to come vnto them, roſe vp in mutinie, and ſo in a great rage brake into Baſta the Generall his lodging, where hauing heaped vpon him many vnworthie and deſpightfull reproches, with their peeces bent againſt him, and taking the ſpoile of certaine cariages loaded with many rich commodities, they departed from him, and ſo marching through the country toward PRESBVRG, by the way vſed ſuch inſolencie and crueltie, by rifling and ſpoiling whatſoeuer came in their way, as that they ſeemed vnto the people as they went worſe and more inhumane than the very Turks and Tartars them ſelues: where amongſt the other prey by them taken, which were very great, they caried away with them toward PRESBVRG aboue 10000 oxen, and 2000 horſes; threatening by the way as they went to burne the ſuburbs of the citie ſo ſoone as they came thither, if they were not forthwith paid their pay: whereupon many of the citizens for feare forſooke their dwellings, and remooued to VIENNA.

Newſoll taken by the Haiduks.

But the rebels on the other ſide hauing (as is before declared) in vaine attempted to haue taken NEVVSOLL, being foorthwith driuen out of it againe, aſſembling themſelues in great number, came now againe and beſieged it, and the ſixteenth day of Aprill tooke it, to the great and incomparable loſſe of the citizens: other of their fellowes in other places hauing but the day before taken CIBINIVM, PORTFELD, SCHEMNITSE, with ſome other places alſo.

The miſerable eſtate of Hungarie through ciuill diſcord.

Thus while the Haiducks at their pleaſure on the one ſide ſpoile the vpper part of HVNGARIE, and the Emperors ſouldiors on the other ſide for want of pay doe therein no leſſe harme than they, as enemies rifling and ranſacking euery corner of the countrey as they went, the poore huſbandmen dwelling here and there diſperſed abroad in the country, for feare leauing their homely dwellings, with ſuch things as they had, fled ſome of them into POLONIA, other-ſome into the mountains, where many of them periſhed with hunger; the poore huſbandman not daring now to go forth to till his land, neither the ſheepheard to feed his flocke, all places being filled with miſerie, mourning, and heauineſſe, the Turks and Tartars, the common enemies of the Chriſtians being not the cauſers thereof, but euen the Chriſtians themſelues, one of them euen with greedineſſe ſeeking the ruine and deſtruction of another, as moſt commonly it falleth out in kingdomes and ſtates diuided.

Moravia ſpoiled by the rebellious Haiducks.

Neither did theſe ſo great troubles, the ground of ſo many miſeries, containe themſelues within the bounds of HVNGARIE onely, but brake out into other countries and prouinces thereunto adioyning alſo; but eſpecially into MORAVIA, into which countrey the Haiduckes breaking, miſerably ſpoiled the ſame, by force tooke certaine townes, which they robbed and rifled, carrying away with them euen the very little children, taken from their heauie parents to be ſold afterwards vnto the Turkes: a miſerable kind of marchandiſe, & of all Chriſtians to be

A be deteſted. For remedie of which miſchiefes, by ſufferance ſtill more and more encreaſing, Lichtenſtein Gouernour of the countrey hauing raiſed all the power that hee was able for to make, went againſt them, and with much adoe at length draue them out of the countrey, with fire and ſword now by them moſt grieuouſly ſpoiled: they for al that carying away with them a great part of the wealth of the country, with 4000 captiues, all by them appointed vnto the Turkes ſlauerie.

About this time alſo Baſta lying at PRESBVRG, and vnderſtanding that foureteene thouſand Turkes and Tartars being come to S. Georges, ſix thouſand of them were gone ouer the Danubius, about a myle beneath PRESBVRG, to the end that whileſt they were making a rode into AVSTRIA, the reſt in the meane time might proue their forces vpon PRESBVRG; with his
B horſemen followed after them himſelfe, to cut off ſuch ſtragling companies of them as otherwiſe might haue done great harme abroad in the countrey, leauing behind him in PRESBVRG but three hundred Wallon horſmen, with certaine companies of footmen for the keeping of the citie. Which three hundred horſmen being very good and expert ſouldiors, and deſirous to be doing ſomething, by night made a rode out of the citie toward S. Georges, where the reſt of the Haiducks and Turkes in great ſecuritie lay: vpon whom theſe reſolute men vpon the ſudden falling, brought a great feare vpon the whole campe, and hauing ſlain of them aboue fiue hundred before the reſt could arme themſelues, returned with a great victory, though but with ſmall prey, carying with them ſome few horſes of ſeruice to PRESBVRG: where, by that they had done, it was reaſonably thought, that had they been but a thouſand ſtrong, they had
C diſcomfited the enemies whole campe.

A notable exploit by a few performed.

In the meane time they of the garriſon of COMORA vnderſtanding that Begedes Baſſa was determined with a notable conuoy to goe from BVDA with ſeuenteene waggons loaded with money and other things of great value, to Botſcay the rebell and the Tartar Cham his ſonne, who with certaine thouſands of Tartars was come to SOLNOK to the aid of Botſcay and the rebels: they in hope of ſo great a bootie lay in wait for him vpon the way whereby hee muſt needs paſſe, and at his comming ſet vpon him, and ſlew a number of his men; amongſt whom it fortuned the Baſſa himſelfe to be ſlaine, ſhot in the breaſt with a ſmall ſhot, whileſt hee was mounting vp his horſe: whoſe dead bodie the Turks about him hauing taken vp, and therewith about to flie, were there ſome of them ſlaine, and ſome of them taken priſoners, the reſt
D by ſpeedie flight eſcaping. Here were alſo all the aforeſaid wagons taken with an exceeding rich bootie; all which the garriſon ſouldiours well worthie thereof, caried away with them to COMORA, together with the Baſſaes head, ſtrucke from his bodie with his owne ſcimitar: which ſcimitar, with the Baſſaes rich coat, Pogranius the Gouernour of COMORA afterward ſent as a preſent vnto the Emperour at PRAGE. This Baſſa while he liued was a moſt craftie and ſubtill man, the chiefe plotter and author of all the late troubles in HVNGARIE, hauing before put all TRANSILVANIA into moſt dangerous ſtirrs and tumults, and greatly confirmed Botſcay in his rebellion: he ſpake the Hungarian language naturally, and was therein very eloquent, which ſerued him to great purpoſe both for the raiſing and maitaining of the rebellion both in TRANSYLVANIA and in HVNGARIE. Which ſo dangerous a man taken out of the way,
E many were in good hope of ſome good end to be made of theſe ciuill warres, more dangerous vnto the ſtate of both theſe afflicted countries, than were the great and puiſſant armies of the Turkes, which were almoſt euery yeare in the heart of the one or of the other of them to bee ſeene.

Begedes Baſſa ſlaine.

Now was the rebellion growne ſo great in HVNGARIE, and the rebels ſo ſtrong, that euen the very name of the Germans was become vnto the Hungarians both odious and contemptible: inſomuch that Baſta offering to haue put new ſupplies of Germane ſouldiors into the citie of TYRNA, then in danger of the Haiduckes, the Gouernous of the place not only refuſed to receiue them, but alſo to let them haue any thing of them for their readie money, ſaying, That they had citizens ynow in the citie to defend the ſame againſt their enemies, and F that therefore as they needed not of the helpe of the Germans, ſo they would haue nothing to doe with them. And yet ſo ſoone as Redeius Botſcay his lieutenant was with his armie come thither, they without more adoe opened vnto him the gates of the citie, and receiuing him in, were about to haue ſlaine all the Germanes there dwelling amongſt them, being welneere a third part of the inhabitants; and had ſo done, but that ſome wiſer than the reſt, conſidering that that the Germanes hauing there long dwelt, were by often marriages ioyned in affinity with G

The Germane in Tyrna constrained to weare garments like to the Hungarians. the Hungarians,and the Hungarians with them,otherwise perſuaded them, leaſt in ſo doing they might ſeeme to be cruell againſt their owne bloud. And ſo the matter being referred to Redeius himſelfe,it was by him(by the counſell of one of the greateſt men of the Turks)ordered, That the Germans ſhould be ſpared their liues, ſo that from thenceforth they ſhould no more vſe the Germane but the Hungarian apparell and attire: only the German attire being taken away for the Germanes themſelues.

Great townes taken & rifled by the rebels in Hungarie. But to proceed with theſe troubles according to the courſe of the time and of the yeare, about the 24 of May the Turks and Tartars joyning their forces with the rebels, burnt foureteene countrey villages about the lake of NEVSIDLER, and as many moe in other places alſo H towards NEVSTAT,leauing behind them moſt lamentable remembrances and teſtimonies of their barbarous and inhumane crueltie, hauing put moſt of the women and children to the ſword,and empaled diuers vpon ſtakes,carrying the men away with them as captiues, & the beaſts and cattell as a prey;and ſo leauing the countrey as they went almoſt deſolate, ſcarce any being therein left to bewaile the miſeries thereof. And about the end of this ſame month the rebels ſurpriſed SIMEGA,GROTTA, and COPPERNACVM,and a little while after GINSIVM alſo: all which places they rifled and ſpoyled, as they did alſo HOGENGOA, a great towne of the Lord Lichtenſteins, and NIDERSPRVNGA, a towne of Collonitzes, which they firſt rifled and afterward burnt; and with the terrour of this their dealing enforced all the countrey thereabout both farre and neere to yeeld vnto them, onely ALTSOLL and CHREMNICZ I continued in their loyaltie, and ſtanding faſt for the Emperour, did the rebels much harme.

The Haiducks and Turks ouerthrowne at Presburg by the Wallons. About the beginning of Iune certaine companies of Turkes and Haiduckes mingled together came againe as they had before done to PRESBVRG: ofwhoſe comming the Gouernour of the citie hauing aduertiſement,with three troops of Wallon horſemen and certaine companies of harquebuſiers breaking out of the citie,cauſed them forthwith to retire:which the Wallon horſemen ſeeing, to preuent them in their retreat, fetching a compaſſe about, met with them when they thought themſelues paſt all danger, and falling vpon them, ſlew of them fiue hundred, and draue the reſt into Danubius; ſo that of all thoſe Turks and Haiduckes none eſcaped but only foureteene, amongſt whom three Turks and one fugitiue citizen of PRESBVRG were found, whom together with a great ſpoyle the garriſon ſouldiers carried backe with them into the citie. K

Vesprinium yeelded vnto the rebels. At the ſelfeſame time the citizens of VESPRINIVM fauouring the proceedings of the Haiduckes, roſe themſelues in rebellion alſo,and taking the captaine of the caſtle, together with his lieutenant,and the keyes of the caſtle,cauſed them to be carried to Redeius Botſcay his lieutenant, yeelding themſelues into his protection. Of which reuolt of the citie the Turkes tooke exceeding pleaſure,and forthwith ſent newes thereof vnto the Sultan, wiſhing him to haſt the comming of his armie, for that the paſſages were now layed open vnto his further conqueſt, and further aduiſing him ſtill more and more to encourage Botſcay in his rebellion, L

Stiria and Austria ſpoyled by the rebels. And now was HVNGARIE too little or elſe too bare to containe and ſatisfie the ſtill encreaſing rebels, who in great number breaking into STIRIA (as they had before done on the other ſide of HVNGARIE into MORAVIA) did therein great harme, waſting and ſpoyling all before them as they went, inſomuch, that Countie Serin, the Lord Nadaſti, and Budian, all right worthie men and ſuch as heretofore had done great things againſt the Turkes for the Chriſtian Commonweale, ſeeing themſelues and all that they had in danger to be ſpoyled, being themſelues not able to withſtand the rebels, nor any other ſtay whereon to reſt, ſubmitted themſelues vnto Botſcay, as did many other noblemen of that countrey alſo. Out of STIRIA the rebels made head into AVSTRIA, and there roming vp and downe the countrey, did like harme. M

Thus was the ſtate of AVSTRIA and HVNGARIE at this time moſt miſerable, which for that it is ſo well ſet downe in certaine letters by a graue and vnderſtanding citizen of VIENNA,who was himſelfe an eye-witneſſe of moſt part thereof, as that it cannot well better be expreſſed, I haue thought it good to referre the report thereof vnto the letters themſelues.

A

All AVSTRIA (saith hee) is full of miserie and calamitie. From out of the Castle and Bulwarkes heere at VIENNA, a man may sometime at once behold fifteene townes and villages all on fire in the countrey hereabout, kindled partly by the Rebels and Turkes, and partly by our owne mutinous Souldiours. ODENBVRG is yet besieged: and the Hasduckes haue forraged the countrey as farre as HINBERG: whom had not the regiment of Collonitz represſed, these our ſuburbes of VIENNA had now beene taken, ranſackt, and burnt. NEVSTAT is on euery ſide beſieged by the enemie; all the Villages about VIENNA as farre as DRESSKIRC are with fire deſtroyed: they of NEVSTAT went about to haue cut off ſome part of the enemies forces, but with euill ſucceſſe, hauing loſt aboue fiftie of their owne men: BRVNNA and ENTZENDORFF B are alſo with fire conſumed: The Wallons lye encamped at MIEDLING, moſt miſerably ſpoyling the Countrey people of all that they had: The Haiduckes hauing by night ſurprized the great towne of ALTENBVRG, and from thence carrying a great prey, haue burnt it: The Caſtle had endured the like fortune, had not an hundred harquebuſiers, that were by chaunce come thither, holpen to defend it. Sixe thouſand of the enemies lye about VISSELBVRG, but whether the Wallons will attempt any thing againſt them, or no, it is greatly doubted. PRESBVRG is alſo in great danger: for the garriſon ſouldiours there doe threaten the cruell ſpoyle of the Citizens, and all extreamities, if by a certaine day they receiue not their Pay: who if they ſhall depart thence, there is no doubt but that the Haiduckes will forthwith ſucceed them in their places: Theſe men indeed doe pretend Religion, but what louers they be thereof, the late example of a C Miniſter by them moſt cruelly tormented, not farre from COBBELSDORFF, doth manifeſtlie ſhew. The report is, that the Vayuod of VALACHIA doth fauour neyther part: into which Prouince a great number of Tartars are come in the ayde of Botſcay. All the market places and ſtreetes heere in this citie lye full of poore fugitiue creatures, of all ſexe and ages; a moſt miſerable ſight to behold. Our owne mutinous ſouldiours beſet all the waies to the citie, and exclude vs from all manner of victuall; and not to vſe many words, in crueltie and hoſtilitie almoſt exceed the very enemies. The Hungarian rebels, who of late forraged AVSTRIA, *haue carried away with them aboue eight thouſand head of cattell, which together with the priſoners by them taken, they haue ſent into Turkey. The miſerable troubles of Hungarie and of Auſtria notably deſcribed by the letters of a Citizen of Vienna.

Thus farre hee: Whereby the Reader (as I ſuppoſe) may eaſily gather the miſerable eſtate F of both the countries of HVNGARIE and AVSTRIA, the Chriſtians themſelues being the chiefe authors thereof.

The rebellious Haiduckes had hitherto moſt ſtraitly beſieged the citie of ODENBVRG, hauing aſſaulted it in fiue ſundrie places at once: vpon whom Trautmanſtorfe, Generall of the Garriſon there, cauſing part of his horſemen to ſallie forth, skirmiſhed with them from

from eleuen of the clocke in the forenoone, vntill two of the clock in the afternoone, at which time the Haiducks beginning to preuaile, the Gouernor with the reſt of his horſmen, certain enſignes of footmen, with ſome of the citizens, with three field-pieces, vpon the ſuddaine breaking out of the gate, diſcomfited the Haiduckes, put them to flight, and ſlew many of them, hauing taken from them twelue enſignes, with many priſoners, whom he carried with him into the citie. Of which ouerthrow the Haiduckes deſirous to be reuenged, with their renued forces ſhortly after returned againe vnto the citie, burnt the ſuburbes of the ſame, and ſpoyled the villages thereabout. But whileſt they thus lay about Odenbvrg, Baſta but with a ſmall power drawing neere vnto them, they preſently roſe, and paſſing ouer the riuer Drauus, carried away with them two thouſand head of cattell, with a great number of Chriſtian captiues. G

The Turks ſeeke to haue Caſſouia deliuered vnto them by Botſcay.

The Turks being not to learne to make vſe of the diſcord of the Chriſtians among themſelues had oftentimes bin in hand with Botſcay to deliuer Cassovia wholly into their hands. Of which ſtrong citie, being the beſt that the Chriſtians now held in the vpper Hvngarie, the Turkes were moſt deſirous, both for the commodious ſituation thereof, and alſo for that they deemed themſelues partly thereof alreadie poſſeſſed, ſome good part of the garriſon therein, being Turkes as well Ianizaries as others. The full poſſeſſion of which ſtrong citie, the better to obtaine from Botſcay, and to get it into their owne hands, they ſent vnto him three waggons loaded with money and other rich commodities for a preſent, and to ſupplie his wants, by a good conuoy of foure hundred Haiducks with certaine Turks ioyned vnto them. Which Haiduckes as they were by the way to Cassovia to paſſe by Tokay, a ſtrong towne holden by the Chriſtians, gaue ſecret knowledge vnto the Gouernour of the place of their comming that way, and that if he would receiue them into the towne, and ſo into his protection, they would with ſome ſmall helpe from him deliuer into his hands that ſo rich a bootie, and ſo continue with him as his faithfull and truſtie ſouldiours. Of whoſe offer the Gouernour well aſſured, forthwith ſent forth foure hundred of the ſouldiors of his own garriſon to meet them, who ioyning with the aforeſaid Haiduckes which came with the conuoy, ſet vpon the Turks which came with them, and ſlew them euery mothers ſonne: and ſo with the rich bootie were by the Gouernour receiued into the towne, and by him courteouſly entertained: where they had not long lyen, but that after their woonted manner looking abroad into the countrie, they chaunced to meet with certaine companies of Botſcay his men, with whom they encountering, and hauing ſlaine of them neere about fiue hundred, tooke from them ſeuen waggons loaded with good prouiſion, and thirtie horſes, beſide much other rich ſpoile. Totiſa yeelded vnto the Turks

But the rebels, notwithſtanding theſe and ſuch other loſſes, encreaſing both in number and in power, ſtill more and more in all places preuailed, but eſpecially in the vpper part of Hvngarie, the townes there one after another daily reuolting vnto them, as among the reſt, the ſtrong towne of Totisa did, whereinto the rebels entring, ſent from thence part of the great ordnance, together with Relinger a Germane captaine, Gouernour of the towne, and certaine other Germane ſouldiors there taken, vnto Redeias Botſcay his lieutenant, then lying with a great armie of thirtie thouſand Hungarian rebels and Turkes at the ſiege of the ſtrong towne and caſtle of Nevvhvse: Which as it had oftentimes by him beene ſharpely aſſaulted, ſo was it by the ſouldiors therein moſt notably defended; proteſting neuer to yeeld the ſame, but to hold it out euen to the laſt man therein to be left aliue. Which cauſed Redeius for the encouraging of his ſouldiours (who had now lyen there certaine moneths at the ſiege thereof) to promiſe vnto them the whole ſpoile of the towne and of that therein was. And yet for all that oft times kept backe the Turkes from aſſaulting the ſame, for feare leaſt if they ſhould by force haue taken it, they would by force alſo haue holden it vnto themſelues, as a place for them moſt commodious for the conquering of that which remained of the vpper part of Hvngarie: which he, though one of the greateſt rebels, was yet loth to haue it to fall into their hands: and yet himſelfe, with the Haiduckes the Hungarian rebels, afterward, viz. the 25 of Iuly, gaue thereunto a moſt furious aſſault, inſomuch, that hauing aduaunced tenne of their enſignes to the top of the rampiers, they were in great hope euen preſently to haue taken it, but yet were by the reſolute valour of the defendants notably repulſed, and enforced againe to retire, leauing behind them aboue ſeuen hundred of their moſt forward men dead L

A dead in the trenches. Vnto which ſiege the Baſſa of AGRIA came alſo afterward with three thouſand horſemen & a number of Ianizaries; ſo that the beſieged, partly with mynes, partly with ſhot and often aſſaults diſtreſſed, were ſo waſted and wounded, that there were ſcarcely two hundred whole & ſound men left in the whole garriſon: beſide that both victuals and pouder begun now to grow ſcarce alſo, ſo that they were brought vnto ſuch extremitie, as that well they could not be in worſe caſe: and yet armed with a conſtant reſolution they ſeemed not to be any thing therwith danted or diſcouraged, but ſtill valiantly held it out. Neuhuſe diſtreſſed.

The Hungarians dwelling in the Iſle of SHVT in the riuer of Danubius, hauing before ſubmitted themſelues vnto the rebels did with their helpe much trouble the paſſages, vnto B the towne of RAB and COMARA, and the citie of STRIGONIVM; vnto whom certaine meſſengers were ſent on the Emperours behalfe to perſuade with them to forſake the rebels and to returne againe vnto their auncient obedience. Who ſo well vſed the matter with them, that taking a truce for eight dayes, they in the meane time ſent fiue of the chiefe men amongſt them by ſhip to PRESBVRG offering vnto the gouernour there, That if they might be ſecured of their goods and ſafetie, and that the Haiducks that were with them might be entertained in pay, they would be readie againe to take the oath of allegiance and faithfully to ſerue him as became his loyall ſubiects and valiant ſouldiors: and for the aſſurance thereof, to leaue their wiues and children as pledges at PRESBVRG. Which their offer was vnto the gouernour verie acceptable and welcome, who yeelding vnto their requeſt, in friendly ſort diſmiſſed them. The rebels in the iſle of Shut ſubmit themſelues againe vnto the Emperour.

C But they being returned home, and hauing declared to the reſt of their fellowes what they had done; it was by generall conſent agreed, that foure thouſand of them ſhould ioine themſelues vnto the emperours power vnder the regiment of Collonitz, who to be knowne from others, wore in their creſts certaine ſpeciall feathers; their wiues and children being carried to PRESBVRG as pledges of their faith: but this agreement by them made with the Gouernour of PRESBVRG being once knowne, the reſt of the rebels in the countrie thereabout together aſſembled with the Turks, inuaded the iſle, in hope vpon the ſodaine to haue ſurpriſed them: but deceiued of their expectation, were by the inhabitants of the Iſle and by the help of certaine Germane troupes ouerthrowne and put to flight, and three thouſand of them there ſlaine.

D About the beginning of Iuly certaine commiſſioners were ſent on the emperours behalfe to COSSOVIA, to intreat with Botſcay concerning a pacification to be made, who being by him there honorably entertained, and hauing with him ſtayed almoſt a whole moneth, were at length the nine and twentith of the ſame month againe diſmiſſed. Now the articles, which Botſcay propounded vnto theſe commiſſioners to be conſidered of for the making of a peace and which for the moſt part were agreed vpon in the peace afterward concluded betwixt the great Sultan and the Emperor, were theſe.

Articles by Botſcay propounded vnto the Emperors Commiſſioners for the appeaſing of the tumults in the vpper Hungary

Firſt, that it ſhould be lawfull for all ſuch as would, to haue the free exerciſe of the reformed religion. For although (as he ſaid) he was not ignorant that there was an ancient decree amongſt the Hungarians, whereby all that profeſſed not the Catholicke religion, or that reE uolted from the ſame, were to be burnt, and that hee deſired not to haue that article repealed; yet that his requeſt was, That the Emperour hauing regard vnto the troubles of the preſent time, would promiſe and aſſure, That from thenceforth no man ſhould be troubled for his religion, or called in queſtion for his conſcience and beliefe. Beſides that, he requeſted to haue the Principalitie of TRANSYLVANIA during his life, yet with this condition, that after his death it ſhould againe returne vnto the emperour, ſo that the emperor in his abſence ſhould appoint a naturall Hungarian to gouerne the ſame, as alſo to haue the chiefe gouernment in HVNGARIE. That there ſhould no more Biſhops ſit in counſell but one, and that he, if it ſhould ſo be thought meet, ſhould beare the office of the Chauncellor. That the liberties and priuiledges of that kingdome ſhould be kept whole and inuiolate. That it ſhould F be lawfull for him onely to make choice of the chiefe Palatine of the kingdome. That goods confiſcated for any offence comm itted, ſhould not be diſperſed or ſold, but giuen to men of deſert. That all offendors againſt the State from thenceforth ſhould be iudged by the counſell of HVNGARIE. That none ſhould be preferred to Biſhoprickes in HVNGARIE, but ſuch as were of the noble Hungarian bloud. That all iniuries heretofore done ſhould be abſolutly pardoned, forgiuen and forgetten. All which things if they might be granted, he promiſed to G labour to the vttermoſt of his power, vpon the beſt conditions he might to procure a peace betwixt the great Sultan & the Emperor. Laſt of all he requeſted, That the charters of peace containing theſe articles thus agreed vpon, might be ſubſcribed & confirmed by the Biſhop of ROME, the emperor, the king of POLONIA, and all the imperiall kingdomes & prouinces.

The great Sultan loath that Botſcay ſhould come to a peace with the Emperour.

The Turkiſh Sultan vnderſtanding of this treatie of peace betwixt the emperor and Botſcay, by a meſſenger ſent in haſt to Botſcay, ſought by great offers and promiſſes to hinder the ſame: putting him withall in remembrance, that a little before this treatie made he had not only by words but by letters alſo, ſubſcribed with his owne hand, promiſed vnto Botſcay his embaſſadors ſent to CONSTANTINOPLE, That he would bring to paſſe, that Botſcay rewarded with ſuch priuiledges as king Iohn in former time enioyed, ſhould in ſhort time bee proclai- H med and crowned king of HVNGARIE, & that to that purpoſe he was euen now readie to ſend a ſcepter and a crown, the ornaments of a king, to ALBA REGALIS. But for the preſent, he by theſe meſſengers ſent vnto Botſcay two goodly horſes, with furniture of gold, gliſtering with pretious ſtones. He ſent him alſo a rich ſcimitar, a paire of golden ſpurs, & a long horſemans coat garniſhed with gold and pretious ſtones of great price; perſuading him valiantly to perſiſt in his former courſe and purpoſe. Which he failed not to do: for imediatly after, he with a gallant traine went from CASSOVIA into TRANSYLVANIA, there to take of the Nobilitie of that prouince the oth of their fidelity vnto him; accounting no pains or labor great, which he tooke to turne the people from their obedience vnto the emperor, and to ſtrengthen himſelfe. At which time he alſo ſent Redeius his Chauncelor, with ſome others, into POLONIA, to I renew the confederation which was ſometime betwixt the Polonians and the Hungarians: who being admitted vnto the kings preſence, & audience giuen him, firſt declared the cauſes of the diſcord and ciuile war that then was in HVNGARIE, which he imputed chiefly vnto the oppreſſion of religion, the free exercíſe thereof being forbidden them, and to the inſolencie of the Germans, who there at their pleaſure commanded ouer them. Vpon which two points he ſtood much, labouring with many words to perſuade the king therof: and afterwards requeſting him of his gratious goodneſſe, & of the care which he, together with other Chriſtian princes had for the common quiet of the Chriſtian commonweale in general, and eſpecially of thoſe two diſtreſſed countries, lying as it were euen in the enemies mouth, to enter into conſultation how the ſame euils might be remedied, & thoſe ſo great troubles againe appea- K

ſed, and to the effecting of ſo good a worke to put to his helping hand. Whereunto the king anſwered, That the friendſhip wherein Botſcay offered to ioyne with him being but the renuing of the auncient amitie betwixt the countries of POLONIA and HVNGARIE, to be vnto him pleaſing: howbeit, he could not for all that (as he ſaid) wel like of Botſcay his reuolt from that houſe and familie, whereunto he was himſelfe ſo neere ioyned in affinitie; promiſing yet neuertheles, that he would propound the matter vnto his nobilitie, to be further conſidered of: which when he had indeed done, it was by common conſent agreed, That no aid ſhould be giuen out of POLONIA vnto Botſcay or the rebels, and that whoſoeuer ſhould from thence afford him any aid, ſhould therefore loſe his head. With which anſwere the embaſſadors returned to Botſcay much diſcontented, being now with a great power againe returned out of L TRANSYLVANIA to CASSOVIA.

The L. Ruſſworm beheaded

About this time the Lo. Ruſſworm (ſometimes Generall of the Emperors armie againſt the Turks in HVNGARIE, a man of great note and valor, and of whom we haue before much ſpoken) at PRAGE falling into words, and from words to blows, with Francis, Count Belioioſa his brother, and their men taking their parts on both ſides, it fortuned the ſaid Francis, the Earles brother, being grieuouſly wounded, to be there ſlaine, Belioioſa himſelfe being alſo in fiue places dangerouſly hurt; who ſo hardly proſecuted the death of his brother againſt the L. Ruſſworm, that within a while after he was therefore by the Emperour condemned, and at PRAGE beheaded, and diuers of his men hanged, with ſuch weapons hanging at their heeles, as wher- M with they had ſlaine the ſaid Fracis, the Earles brother.

The Turks troubles againſt his rebels, and the Perſians in the Eaſt, an eaſe vnto the Chriſtians in the Weſt.

Now was the time of the yeare come, when as the Turks great armies were woont to bee ſeene euen in the heart of HVNGARIE: howbeit, ſuch were their troubles in ASIA, both with the Perſian and their owne rebels, that they were not at lieſure now to ſend ſuch great forces

A as they had before vſed, into HVNGARIE: neither could the Chriſtian Emperour on the other ſide now raiſe ſuch a power as he had in former times done to oppoſe againſt them, & to hinder their proceedings. The Hungarians themſelues (his greateſt ſtrength in thoſe wars) were now generally reuolted from him, and for moſt part followed the enſignes of the rebel Botſkay. The Princes wont to ſend him aid both out of ITALIE and out of GERMANIE, now affoorded him little or none at all: and his mercinarie ſouldiors for want of pay were now almoſt euery where vp in mutinie readie to forſake his ſeruice, & to pay themſelues with the ſpoyle of his countries euen vnto the gates of VIENNA. So that had not the Turkes beene ſo buſied in the Eaſt, but at leiſure to haue turned their whole power into HVNGARIE, as oftentimes
B they had before done, it is hardly to be imagined, what ſhould haue letted thé to haue ouerrun not only that which remained of HVNGARIE, but euen all AVSTRIA, with ſome good part of GERMANIE alſo; the Emperors preparations being then ſo ſmall, and his forces ſo weake, as that they were not able to hold the field againſt his own rebellious ſubiects, much leſſe againſt ſo puiſſant and dreadful an enemie. But God which with his word hath ſet bounds vnto the raging ſea, beyond which it cannot paſſe, & by whoſe power kings do raigne and princes bare rule, had by other means auerted the greateſt part of the Turks forces Eaſtwards: ſo that Serdar Baſſa, Sultan Achmat his Lieutenant Generall for his wars againſt the Chriſtians, came this yeare but with a right ſmall armie (in compariſon of thoſe which the Turkiſh Sultans were wont to ſend) into HVNGARIE. Howbeit, with ſuch forces as he brought, and with
C ſuch ſupplies of the rebels in HVNGARIE as came vnto him, he being growne 50000 ſtrong, and out of feare of the Emperors forces, came the 29 day of Auguſt to STRIGONIVM, and with his armie (part Turks, part Tartars, and part diſloyall Chriſtians) encamped in the ſelfe-ſame place where the Turks armie had but the yere before lodged, hauing brought with him fortie great pieces of batterie, with all things elſe neceſſarie for the ſiege. Neither were the Turkes ſooner encamped, but that the Tartars which came with them to the ſiege (after their wonted manner) more deſirous of prey and bootie, then of honor and victory, paſſing ouer riuer of Gran into the territorie of the Chriſtians, there ſpoyled and burnt all before them as they went.

The Turkes in the meane time to depriue the beſieged of all reliefe to bee ſent vnto them
D down the riuer of Danubius, made a great bridge of boats ouer the riuer, well fortified at both ends thereof on each ſide the riuer with a ſtrong Corps de garde for the defence thereof, ſo that nothing could that way paſſe to or from the beſieged citie. Which things much diſmayed them in the citie, ſeeing no preparations to be made on the other ſide for their defence or reliefe: yea Baſta himſelf, Generall of ſuch ſmall forces as the emperor had then, ſeeing the enemie ſo ſtrong, & himſelfe ſo weake, began greatly to doubt of the euent of this ſiege: and yet neuertheleſſe reſolutly ſet downe to employ both his valor and his wiſdome for the ſafegard of the place, he during the time of the ſiege failed not to the vttermoſt of his power to ſhew the effects both of the one and of the other.

The Turkes make a bridge ouer the riuer of Danubius, to keep Strigonium from being that way relieued.

And now the Turks aſſiſted with the Hungarian rebels, had performed an exploit vpon the E Iſle of STRIGONIVM, aſwel to take the ſame from the Imperials, as for the ſpoile and pillage thereof. The inhabitants there had ſtill remained faithfull vnto the ſeruice of the Emperour, whom the rebels for all that had oftentimes ſought both by force and by perſuaſion to haue remoued from this their loyaltie & iuſt deuoir. Within this iſle were 200 Haiducks returned again to the emperors ſeruice, who were ioined vnto the Iſlanders, for the better defence both of them & of the Iſland. But the rebels knowing well the paſſages and entrances into the iſle, vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed the ſame, and in it theſe poore Haiducks, whom they cut all in pieces: which loſſe cauſed Baſta to reſolue to ſend the Wallons he had in his armie into the iſle for the defence thereof. Which they of the iſland vnderſtanding, made requeſt vnto the Generall, That he would not in any wiſe ſo doe, for that they greatly feared leaſt the Wallons F being men altogether giuen to the ſpoyle, not finding the rebels to prey vpon, ſhould after their woonted manner prey vpon them, the Emperours faithfull ſubiects. At whoſe inſtance the former purpoſe for the ſending of the Wallons being changed, Collonitz himſelfe was appointed vnto that ſeruice; with whom Monſieur de Laual, a noble young gentleman of FRAVNCE (who but a few dayes before was newly come vnto the campe, for fiftie moe of them taken priſoners. In which conflict the noble young gentleman Laual ſo brauely behaued himſelfe, as that hee gained vnto himſelfe much honour and renowne, eue-ry mans mouth being full of his prayſes, and wondering to ſee ſo great courage in ſo young yeares, hee being then ſcarce nineteene yeares old. With which loſſe the rebels rather enraged than diſcouraged, ſhortly after returned againe, in greater number and better reſolued, where betwixt them, and them that were left for the defence of the iſland, was fought H a more ſharpe and bloudie fight than was the former, yet ſo, as that the rebels were enforced againe with loſſe to retire. In which ſo hote and bloudie a skirmiſh, Monſieur Laual hauing moſt valiantly borne himſelfe againſt the enemie, and done enough for his honour, but not ſo contented, but carried away with the heat of youth, and the deſire of glorie, and not otherwiſe to be perſwaded, but ſtill aduenturouſly preſſing on the retiring enemy, was there with a ſmall ſhot ſlaine; all they which knew him much lamenting his vntimely death. But Monſieur Laual ſlaine. the rebels not ſo diſcouraged, but ſtill in one place or other inuading the Iſland, and threatening the Iſlanders with all extremities, except they would take part with them, what by force, what by perſuaſion, ſo much preuailed with them, that the moſt part of them reuol-ting from the Emperour, vpon the ſuddaine ſet vpon the Count of RHENE, being I then in the Iſland, and hauing ſlaine three hundred of his men, grieuouſly wounded him-ſelfe alſo. For the ſpeedie appeaſing of which tumult, Baſta ſent ouer into the Iſland certaine companies of the Ratzians and Wallons, who not regarding that the Iſlanders were daily damnified by the rebels, moſt miſerably ſpoyled them of whatſoeuer the rebels had yet left them.

S. Thomas fort battered and aſſaulted by the Turkes. The Turkes encamped before STRIGONIVM, firſt planted their batterie againſt the ſtrong fort, ſtanding aloft vpon S. Thomas hill: for that from thence they ſhould haue receiued infinit harme, if they ſhould before the winning thereof haue attempted to haue woon the citie; it ſtanding on their backes, and all the plaine betwixt the hill and the citie wherein they were to plant their batterie being ſubiect vnto it. Which fort, though very ſtrong, they with conti- K nuall batterie by the ſpace of almoſt three weekes, hauing with infinit charge, and the loſſe of a number of their men, made ſaultable the 24 day of September monnted the hill to aſſault the ſame. Vnto which aſſault they went vp the hill ſo thicke one thruſting an other forward, that the hill ſeemed now to be nothing but a mount or heape of armed men, ſcarce any part of it being to be ſeene, it was ſo couered with them. Vpon whom ſo ſwarming vp, the Chriſtians in the fort, hauing repoſed all the hope of their welfare in their valour, and reſolued thereby to die or liue, couragiouſly diſcharged their murthering ſhot both great and ſmall, ſcarce any of their deadly bullets falling in vaine. Howbeit the Turkes, reſolutely ſet downe for the performing of that they had taken in hand, without reſpect of death or danger, came ſtill deſperately on, vntill that they were come to the puſh of pike, and ſo to handy blowes L euen in the very breaches, which the long furie of the Turks cannon had made very ſaulta-ble. Fiue houres this furious aſſault was by the Turks maintained, and by the Chriſtians with inuincible courage and reſolution endured, many braue & valiant men falling on both ſides:
and thrice the Turkes repulſed, were enforced to retire, but were ſtill by their Commanders brought on againe. The loſſe was to both ſides common, many worthy men there ending their daies, worthy of eternall fame. The Chriſtians fell dead vpon the Turks, ſlaine by their valour, and the Turkes vpon the Chriſtians ſlaine by their multitude. But what ſhould wee ſay? The Turkes by numbers died, but not their force, that being by their great numbers ſtill maintained euen in deſpight of death, and alwaies liuing in their great multitude, yet left aliue. Which was not ſo with the defendants, but euen quite contrarie; who could not looſe M one onely man, without diminiſhing of their forces, and means of reſiſtance: ſo that they ſtill loſt without hope of ſafegard, and yet could not be in ſafetie, without continuing of their ſo great loſſes. But he that ſtill fighteth onely for to ſaue his life, without hope of killing of his e-nemie, being too mighty for him to ouercome, muſt needs at laſt die ouercome, if it were but with

A with very wearineſſe. So in the end of this long and furious aſſault, nine hundred of the Chriſtians being ſlaine, together with the Count Oetingen, their Chiefetaine, and his Lieutenant mortally wounded, and nothing now more left but a few ſore hurt men, & the dead wals for the Turks to ouercome, they entred the place, ſlew thoſe few whom they found yet brething, made bootie of their death, bloud, and armes; and by the infinite price of their owne bloud, gained that place which had now no more bloud or life left in it. From whence they carried certaine great peeces, to helpe to batter the citie withall, and to vanquiſh them, for whoſe defence they were but a little before appointed. S. Thomas fort woon by the Turkes.

The Turks hauing thus gained S. Thomas fort, euen as they were yet embrued with bloud, and prickt forward with furie, forthwith planted thirty great peeces of batterie againſt the B baſe towne of STRAGONIVM, ſtanding low by the ſide of Danubius, and commonlie called the Water Towne; which they with all their force and furie moſt terribly battered. This baſe towne was enuironed with a palliſado of wood, to defend it againſt all ſudden ſurprizes, as almoſt all the townes of HVNGARIE are: Whereunto the confuſed multitude of the Turkes carried a number of bruſh faggots, ſtuffed with gunpouder and brimſtone, which being ſet on fire, preſently ſet fire vpon the palliſado alſo, and burnt it downe to the ground, making a way for the Turks to come euen vnto the wals of the citie; which they with their great ordnance both night and day inceſſantly moſt terribly battered, vntil that by the furie of the canon they had therein made a faire and large faultable breach. A great ſhame for our men to ſuffer the ſame ſo to be made, and not againe repaired: whereas the Turks before in the ſame C place, had made it good againſt the great armie of the Archduke Matthias, being neuer to be driuen and forced out of it by the Chriſtians valour, vntill they were therein ſlaine; and to be now by our men through their cowardize not to be able to be made good. For why, it was euen the ſame place of battell, the ſame men, the ſame armes, and the ſame form of fight, but not the ſame courages. The Turks can very well learn of vs that which is for them profitable, and make vſe thereof to their own aduantage, whereas we can borrow nothing of them to ſerue vs againſt them, & ſo profit our ſelues by their example: Beſides that, the confidence they haue in their multitude carrieth them vnto ſuch aduantages, as from which the deſpaire of being ſeconded and relieued keepeth vs: whoſe boldneſſe alſo firmely grounded vpon a reſolution to die, paſſeth our reſolution far, in fighting only to ſaue our liues. The baſe towne of Stragonium battered.

D The breach ſo made the Turks in good order, ſtayed vpon a firme reſolution, came brauely marching on, one of them thruſting another, and as it were ſtriuing among themſelues who ſhould haue the honour to giue the firſt charge, their hautineſſe of mind animating of them to ſeek for honor euen where perils were riteſt; ſo to haue the honor to die amongſt the moſt forward and valiant men of war, rather than to liue among cowards of no reputation or valour. During the heat of which their ſo great and firme a reſolution, they regarded not the ſhowers of deadly bullets falling amongſt them as thicke as haile, as too weake to dant their haughtie courages; but thruſting one another amidſt theſe ſo great dangers, came vnto the breach, there to trie the matter hand to hand with our men. The Ianizaries were the men eſpecially appointed to this ſeruice, & had taken the ſame vpon them, who with their great muſ- E kets on their reſts cruelly galled our men, expoſed to the danger of their deadly ſhot vpon the brinke as it were of their own graues. The great Baſſa himſelfe was there preſent at the aſſault, encoraging his ſoldiors with ſpeeches ful of terror & of comfort, as he ſaw occaſion for either to be vſed, wherewith he ſtirred vp their valor as is a ſhip with a faire or rough gale of wind. Death it ſelfe could not ouercome theſe miſcreants, their number ſtill repairing in a moment what death had taken away in an houre: where as our men ſlew others but to bee ſlaine themſelues; and fought not but to become ſacrifices vnto death themſelues, & not by their reſiſtance to carie away the victorie againſt inexorable deſtinie. The fight was great and terrible and the bullets ſtill flew, few of them falling in vaine among ſuch a multitude and preaſe of men. They of the high towne, who themſelues expected the like danger, where- F in their companions now floated betwixt life and death, ſtood aboue looking on, not daring to giue them ayde, or to remooue out of their ſtrength, but reſeruing themſelues with all their forces for the ſole ſafegard of themſelues and for their owne defence. Howbeit, all this while the enemies forces ſtill encreaſed, and the Chriſtians diminiſhed; for death could not A terrible aſſault. The great Baſſa encourageth his ſouldiors in the time of the aſſault.

weaken theirs, whereas it ſtill deſtroyed ours, who failed but in number, not in valour, and G gaue place but vnto the force of death, & not vnto the force of men. All the deadly blowes appointed to be giuen for the defence of a breach, had bin by our men giuen; all the armes neceſſarie for ſuch a purpoſe had bin employed, all reſiſtance that could be deſired had been made, and all the duties of valiant and worthie men performed; ſo that nothing here wanted but number, and not valour. But in all ſuch actions there are two things neceſſary the one for the helping of the other, for the correſpondencie of their powers; which both ioyned in one bodie, may doe all things, but being diuided, can neither of them doe any thing againſt him which is poſſeſſed of both.

Power and valour the life of great actions.

In fine, after foure attempts in this aſſault, moſt of the Chriſtian defendants being ſlaine, the Turks forced the reſt and gained the breach, treading vnder foot the dead bodies both H of the Turkes and of the Chriſtians, to get into the citie. This place thus woon, and thoſe that were left put to the ſword, and the towne rifled, the Turkes yet in breath, and all embrued in bloud, gaue an attempt vnto the high towne, in ſome hope euen at that time in ſo great a confuſion of the defendants to haue carried the ſame alſo. Howbeit, the defendants beholding their weapons yet dropping with the bloud of their friends and companions, and readie to ſhed theirs alſo, for the preſent notably repulſed them: Who ſo diſappointed of their purpoſe, and deſiring to gaine the place with the leaſt loſſe they might, reſolued to take the ſame by vndermining of it, repoſing more truſt in the ſpade and the mattocke than in their ſwords and harquebuſiers, being by experience of their former ſieges taught how hard and daungerous a thing it was by batterie and aſſault to obtaine the I ſame. This trauell in the mynes tooke ſucceſſe according to their deſire: for within a few dayes the mynes (with much labour) being brought to perfection, and fire put vnto them, they failed not to worke their effect, but with their great violence blew vp the walls, rampiers, men, and munition, altogether, caſting forth ſuch ſmoakes and flames, as wherewith a number of the defendants were ſmothered and burnt. Which breaches ſo made, and the defences of the citie blowne vp, in ſuch ſort, that the Chriſtians lay open to the enemies deadly ſhot, being not able any more to ſhew themſelues without daunger of their liues, the Turks in order forthwith came to aſſault and force the ſame. Which the captaines of the Chriſtians beholding, prepared themſelues to withſtand them, and to that purpoſe would haue giuen order vnto their ſouldiours for the defence both of the breach and of the walles, K whom they found ſuch as Eumenes at his greateſt need found his, not willing in any wiſe to fight, and in the moſt aſſured perill of death, without courage either to vanquiſh their enemies, or defend themſelues; in ſuch ſort, that not one of them would put themſelues in order, ſhew themſelues vpon the breach, or come neere the wals. Lazie cowards, chuſing rather to attend an aſſured death in their cowardize and want of courage, than to aduenture their liues into the daunger of armes, well deſeruing to endure the ſame with diſhonour, ſeeing that they refuſed by honourable reſiſtance to preſerue their liues. The Captaines for all that by faire ſpeeches and by threats ceaſed not to ſtirre them vp; praying, exhorting, and ſometime with death threatening them, if they thus refuſed to doe their duetie, and with their naked ſwords in their hands would haue enforced them to the breach. L
But all in vaine; their dead courages being not to bee reuiued or ſtirred vp in their ſo great a feare of death: Which much diſmayed the captaines, ſeeing their liues and honour, together with the place (through this tumult and cowardiſe of their ſouldiors) to be in extreame perill. During which time the Turks comming on, had without any great reſiſtance gained the foot of the breach: whom the ſouldiours now ſeeing ſo neere vnto them, and out of hope to be relieued, and deſtitute of courage alſo, in ſtead of truſting vnto their armes and valour, betooke themſelues vnto the refuge of their ſhame and cowardize. For compaſſing in the Count Dampierre, Gouernour of the place, they would by reaſons haue perſuaded him to haue yeelded, and by threats haue feared him from farther reſiſting of the ene- M
mie. Their furie emboldened them, proceeding not from their valour, but from their feare; ſtorming againſt their Generall for not being a coward, as they themſelues were, trembling for feare of their enemies, and inſulting againſt him. They had but one man of him to fight againſt, which made them furious and hardie: hardie with cowardiſe againſt one,

Great cowardiſe in the garriſon ſouldiors of Strigonium.

The garriſon ſouldiors in mutinie againſt the gouernor, would enforce him to yeeld vp the city

A one, not daring to hold vp their weapons againſt their enemies, being many. Howbeit the Count in the middle of theſe feares inraged, continued firme in his reſolution, his courage encreaſing in this ſtorme of mutinie, wiſhing rather to die by the hands of his owne ſouldiours, in the performing of his duetie, than to bee ſaued by the Turkes in the bottome of his diſhonour. Which his ſo braue a reſolution, cauſed him euen in the middeſt of theſe furious and tumultuous companies, to put them in mind of their duties, and to perſuade with them: That the perill they ſo much feared, was greater through their owne feare than indeed it was: that only their fearefull apprehenſion made the danger, and not the action that was by them to bee performed; ſeeing that it was impoſſible for the enemie to ouercome them, if they would but reſolutely ſtand vpon their valour to reſiſt him. That all things reſting but in opi-

B nion, were by themſelues to be ſubdued, if they had but the deſire to ouercome them, and yet of power to ouerthrow them, if they will yeeld to their diſhonour. That therfore they ſhould propound vnto themſelues the honor and the ſhame that was to enſue vnto them, by the different deportment of themſelues in this action, how much the deformitie of the one differed from the beautie of the other, and aſpire vnto the honor which their enemies had ſometimes got in the ſame place, and in the verie ſame action wherein they were now, for hauing with leſſe appearance of their ſafetie ouercome the like danger, wherin their holding out had made them victorious with honour, without any great fight at all. That it ſhould be an eternall infamie vnto them, that the Turks ſhould ſurmount them by their reſolution in an action wher-

C in they ought to ſhew themſelues moſt valorous, & by their cowardiſe become ſubiect vnto them, whom at other times they had accounted vnworthie to bee compared with them in valour. That they ſhould lay their hands vpon their hearts, and remember their eſtate and faith, bound vnto the firſt by their honour, and to the ſecond by their dutie. That they were men of warre, liuing by their pay, which bound them to the ſeruice of him from whom they receiued it, euen vnto death; hauing before obliged their liues vnto their pay: and that they were Chriſtian ſubiects, bound to keepe their promiſe giuen by oath before God. That forgetting either the one or the other of theſe things, they depriued themſelues of the pay promiſed to them, which performed their ſeruice, and loſing their renown in this world, for their cowardiſe, and in the world to come for breaking their faith. That therefore they ſhould continue conſtant in the performance of their dutie, reſoluing themſelues rather to endure an honorable death,

D vnto which belonged the recompence of an eternall fame for their valour and fidelitie: than to prolong a miſerable life with perpetuall infamie for their cowardiſe: whereof for all that they could no more aſſure themſelues by the yeelding vp of the place, than by the defending thereof, for as much as the Turkes were oft times euen as cruell vpon them that yeelded, as thoſe that reſiſted; keeping no faith with the Chriſtians, but as beſt ſtood with their profit and their pleaſure. And that therefore for his part, he was reſolued rather to die with honour in the place, that to be beholden to his enemies for an infamous and miſerable life. And that therfore he beſought them to follow him in this laſt action of their deuoire, which caried with it all the trophies of their precedent actions, wherein they had oftentimes aſſiſted him in many actions of leſſe worth, and of much greater perill.

The braue reſolution of Count Dampierre Gouernour of Strigonium.

His notable remonſtrances vnto his diſcouraged ſouldiors, to perſuade them to hold out the ſiege.

E This diſcourſe grounded vpon ſo good reaſons, and proceeding from ſo great valour, might haue preuailed with any other generous minds, except with theſe degenerate ſouldiours, who by their cowardiſe had hardened themſelues againſt all the points of honor which might any way moue them; in ſuch ſort, that they ſtood as faſt in their baſe cowardiſe, as did their Generall in his valorous and conſtant reſolution. They ſtood with their hands behind them, without any weapons in them, as was their mindes without any courage at all: and as men appointed to be ſacrificed vpon the altar of death, attending without mouing but the hands of them that ſhould ſacrifice them. Great and ſhameleſſe cowardiſe, not daring by reſiſtance to withſtand the violence of their enemies, for feare of hindring them in their deſires,

F being indeed ſuch as had vowed their death to ſatisfie their owne furie. Meane while ſome of theſe ſouldiors ſeeing their ſpeeches to be but vaine, and not able to mooue the Gouernour to ſatisfie their deſire, conceiued the ſame their requeſts, with the reaſons thereof, into writing, which they ſent vnto him. Which the Gouernour hauing read, in their ſight tore their letters in pieces, and trode the ſame vnder his feet, reiecting as well their demaunds by letters, as he had done their requeſt by words. In briefe, hauing forgotten nothing of the duetie of a worthie Generall, and valiant captaine, ioyned now thereunto the office of a ſimple ſouldiour, going himſelfe vnto the breach with ſome few, to defend the ſame. But the more the Count ſtood vpon this his ſo great reſolution, the more theſe cowardly and mutinous villaines proceeded in their baſe obſtinacie, in ſo much that they fell from prayers to furie and rage, threatening to deliuer him their Gouernour together with the place vnto the enemie, to ſaue their liues, if hee himſelfe would not by treatie ſaue them from the eminent perills. If theſe baſe cowards were before deafe vnto the iuſt remonſtrances of their Gouernour, which might haue preſerued them from death and infamie, hee was alſo as deafe as they, to conceiue their requeſts, or to bee mooued with their threats, knowing that hee had more reaſon on his ſide, by conſtant valour to withſtand the wicked and ſhamefull reſolution of his ſouldiours, than they had with diſhonour to enforce him, or to offer him violence, to their eternall ſhame and infamie. G H

In the meane time theſe obſtinate and inraged cowards proceeded from words to deeds, and from requeſtes to violence, as did oft times the diſloyall ſouldiours of Rome, in ſlaying the good Emperours. For they in cruell manner, without reuerence, by force layed hands vpon the Gouernour, put him in priſon, and afterwards crauing parley, fell to treatie with the great Baſſa, about the deliuerie vp of the place. Wherewith the Baſſa well contented, ſent in vnto them Haly Baſſa, to conclude the matter: where, after ſome little talke, it was agreed, That they ſhould deliuer vp the place (which was not in deede theirs to diſpoſe of) and that the Baſſa ſhould therefore promiſe and ſuffer them with bagge and baggage in ſafetie to depart whither they would, with their enſignes frilled vp, and fire in their matches: leauing behinde them their great ordinance, with all their other munition, and warlike prouiſion. Which onely compoſition by the perfidious ſouldiours made in the abſence and indurance of their Generall, was by the Turkes faithfully kept, amongſt a thouſand others like before by them broken: whether it were in reſpect of the eaſie conqueſt of the citie, being one of the chiefe and principall places of all Hvngarie, or for that they beeing ouer-ioyed with the gaining of that which they had ſo long defired, and now ſo little hoped for, they forgate their woonted crueltie, and breach of faith, is doubted. I K

The extraordinary courteſie of the Turkes toward the garriſon ſouldiors of Strigonium at their departure thence.

This citie thus yeelded, the third day of October, and the Turkes forgetting their wonted crueltie, according to their faith and promiſe before giuen, in ſafetie conducted theſe cowardly ſoldiors within a league of Comora, helping them by the way to carrie their ſicke & wounded men, together with their fardels, which the Turks oftimes caried vpon their owne ſhoulders. Theſe cowards which thus went out, with their Gouernour ſent out alſo with them, were in number a thouſand whole and ſound men, fitted (whileſt they were in the citie) with all things neceſſarie for their honor, and defence of the place: but themſelues deſtitute and void of all honour, and courage. A thouſand, which altogether were not worth their Gouernour alone, ſeeing that in him alone there remained more valour than in all that whole multitude. Many of the inhabitants which had there long dwelt, would not forſake the place, but by the leaue of the Turks there remained ſtill, the reſt which would not, hauing leaue in ſafetie to depart whither they would. L

Thus this famous citie of Strigonivm, one of the ſtrongeſt bulwarks of Chriſtendome againſt the Turks, which the Chriſtians had now holden by the ſpace of tenne yeares and one month, after that it was by Count Charles Mansfelt woon from the Turks, when as it had long time before been in the Turks poſſeſſion, woon from the Chriſtians by Sultan Solyman, now againe (as is before ſaid) fell into the power of the Turkes, with threeſcore and ten peeces of great ordnance, and a wonderfull deale of other warlike prouiſion.

The captains & chiefe authors of the mutiny, and yeelding vp of Strigonium, imprisoned, condemned, & moſt ſhamefully, but worthily executed.

Theſe baſe and cowardly ſouldiours, together with the Count their Gouernour, being come to Comora, were iuſtly deſpoyled both of their honour, and of their armes, and ſent backe againe to Presbvrg, where curſed and deteſted of all the world, and eſpecially of the Hungarians themſelues (who although they were reuolted from their alleageance toward the Emperour, yet could they not but much deteſt their ſo ſhamefull and notable cowardiſe) were there, the chiefe of them, committed to priſon; where after they had for a M

A a certaine time lien, and being brought to iudgement, and conuicted of treaſon, in deliuering vp the citie of STRIGONIVM vnto the Turkes, and in ſo doing, to haue greatly damnified the Chriſtian common weale, they were therefore condemned, and according to the qualitie of their offences diuerſly in this maner executed. Captaine Leonard Fredericke Schleker had his iudgement, firſt to haue his right hand cut off, and his tongue drawen out behind in his neck, and both of them nailed to the gallowes, and afterwards to be hanged: howbeit through the interceſſion of many of his friends, he was not hanged, but beheaded. Iohn Michael Schorer, Iohn Hopfie, Adam Lindawar, Philip Dur, and Caſpar Lielharter, all captaines, were adiudged to haue their right hands firſt cut off, and nailed to the gallowes, and afterward hanged: but
B through the interceſſion of Countie Mansfeld, they were hanged, and their hands not cut off. Iohn Lautenberger was condemned to be quartered aliue, but was at the intereeſſion of countie Mansfeld firſt beheaded, and afterward quartered. Iohn Diſchoff with eleuen other, were only hanged. Laurence Marſhall was inioyned to ſerue two yeres againſt the Turks, as a common ſouldior, without pay: but through the interceſſion of Countie Mansfeld, had one yeare pardoned him. Ieremie Strelin with diuers other, which were either fled, or elſe remained ſtill in STRIGONIVM, were iudged, their names to bee ſet vpon the gallowes, and being afterwards caught, ſome of them to be quartered, and otherſome their hands to be cut off, and nailed vpon the gallows, and afterward hanged. And thus theſe diſloyall captaines, by ſhunning of an honorable death in defence of STRIGONIVM, and performing of their dutie, by neglecting the C ſame, procured vnto themſelues a moſt ſhamefull death, attended vpon with perpetuall infamie and diſhonour.

But as the loſſe of this ſtrong place was vnto the Chriſtians heauie and grieuous, ſo was it vnto the Turkes no leſſe pleaſing and ioyfull; it being the place they had of long aboue all others deſired, and whereat they had euer ſince the loſſe thereof, with their great armies in HVNGARIE, for the ſpace of ten yeares ſtill aimed. Howbeit this their ioy endured not long, their proſperitie being too hoat to hold out without ſome cooling blaſt of aduerſe fortune. For the ſame report of Fame, which with the right hand preſented vnto the great Sultan at CONSTANTINOPLE the pleaſing newes of the winning of STRIGONIVM in HVNGARIE, euen with the left hand deliuered likewiſe vnto him the melancholy report of the ouerthrow D of his great armies in ASIA, with the loſſe of DAMASCO, the greateſt citie of SYRIA. For, to begin with the greateſt firſt: The king of PERSIA, inuaded by Cicala Baſſa, Sultan Achmat great Lieutenant in ASIA; and hearing that the Baſſa of CARAMANIA had in charge, with all ſpeed to come vnto him with a great ſupplie of ſouldiors to bee taken vp in CARAMANIA and the countreys thereabout: hee then hauing a puiſſant armie on foot, before prepared for all euents, preſently ſet forward againſt Cicala: whom hee comming vpon not yet readie to fight, by his vnexpected comming, and ſudden charge, ouerthrew his army, and tooke from him all his great ordnance: Cicala himſelfe with three hundred ſouldiours, with much adoe eſcaping, and retiring himſelfe to ADENA, which citie the Perſian king, purſuing Cicala, ſhortly after ſtraitly beſieged. With which vnluckie newes Sultan Achmat much troubled, forth-
E with writ vnto the Baſſa of TREBESOND, with all ſpeed to ſend ayd vnto Cicala: who taking vnto him ſome other of the Turks commaunders, with a great armie ſet forward on his iourney. Of whoſe comming Cicala hearing, the better to direct the Baſſa in his proceeding, cauſed himſelfe with ten of his ſouldiors, whom he beſt truſted, ſecretly by night to be let downe ouer the wals of the citie. And ſo comming to the Baſſa, together with him kept on his way to ioyne battell with the king, as neere vnto the citie as hee could, for that hee had taken order before he came out of the citie, that ſo ſoone as they ſhould perceiue the battell to be ioyned, they ſhould forthwith ſallie out vpon the backes of the Perſians, and ſo by holding of them with a doubtfull battell, to further the victorie. All which the Perſian king, hearing of the Baſſaes comming, wiſely doubting, and not willing to forſake the ſiege, diuided his armie, and F leauing one part thereof to continue the ſiege, went himſelfe with the other to meet the Baſſa. Wherein he vſed ſuch expedition and ſpeed, that with all his power falling vpon him, before he could put his men in order, or range his battell, hee made of the Turkes (now confuſedly, and without all order fighting more for the ſafegard of their liues, than for any hope they had of victorie) ſuch an exceeding great ſlaughter, that few of them eſcaped, but were there almoſt all ſlaine. Cicala himſelfe but with two or three moe, hauing much adoe by getting ting into a little boat,and ſo by paſſing ouer the riuer,to eſcape the danger. After which victo- G rie ſo eaſily gained,the king returning againe to the ſiege, after many ſharp and great aſſaults thereunto giuen,and many men on both ſides loſt, had the ſame at length yeelded vnto his mercie.

Now with this newes of the loſſe of his armies,and of the victories of the Perſian king,Sultan Achmat enraged,cauſed Cicala Baſſa his houſe at CONSTANTINOPLE, full of treaſure and wealth,to bee rifled; after the manner of the world,deeming of the doings of him ſo great a captaine,according to the euent and euill ſucceſſe thereof, though not in his power to haue been remedied: neuertheleſſe,ſhortly after he cauſed great ſummes of money to bee deliuered out of his treaſures,and new forces raiſed,for the renewing of the war againſt the Perſian king. Vnto which ſeruice(now become vnto the Turkes dreadfull)when as many of the Ia- H

For the appeaſing of which mutiny and tumult,the Sultan cauſed the ſame Baſſa to be apprehended and his head ſtrucken off,and ſo with the price of his bloud againe appeaſed them.

But leauing the Perſian king triumphing in his victories, and the great Sultan grieuing at his loſſes,let vs turne aſide into SYRIA, to ſee the troubles the Turkes had euen among themſelues,to the weakening of their ſtate, and the increaſing of the great Sultans cares and griefe. I
The two Baſſaes of DAMASCO and ALEPPO had (as is before declared) beene at great diſcord and variance betwixt themſelues,and the Baſſa of ALEPPO in field ouerthowne,and in his citie beſieged,glad to make his peace with the other Baſſa,by yeelding vnto all ſuch things as it pleaſed him to demand. Which two Baſſaes for all that being diuerſly affected vnto the ſtate. long agreed not,hee of DAMASCO continuing faithfull in his alleageance towards the great Sultan,and the other of ALEPPO ſecretly inclining vnto rebellion. Which the Baſſa of DAMASCO perceiuing,and ioyning vnto him the Baſſaes of TRIPOLIS and GAZARE,with their vnited forces went againſt the Baſſa of ALEPPO,leading with them 60000 good men,with purpoſe to haue beſieged the Baſſa of ALEPPO his enemie, in his citie. But hee betimes aduertiſed of this his deſigne,& not vnprouided for his comming,quickly called together his forces,and K had in very ſhort time raiſed an armie of 30000 valiant men,whom he incouraging,and finding them readie cheerfully to follow him whither ſoeuer he would lead them, marched directly towards his enemies;with whom hee meeting, readily ioyned battell with them,which was fought with ſuch furie & hideous noiſe,as if it had bin two thunderclaps oppoſing each other in one cloud,ſtriuing of themſelues which ſhould burſt out firſt,being like people, like

The medley for a great time continued ſharpe and furious, the number of the one ſide counteruailing the valour of the other;& the others valor ballancing the others great number: howbeit in the end the lone Baſſa ouercame the other three,and the ſmaller number the greater,and putting them to flight, remained ſole victors of the field. Now the victorious Baſſa,as wiſe to vſe the victorie, as he was valiant to obtaine the ſame, ſo L eagerly purſued them,that without giuing them leaue to breathe, he beſieged TRIPOLIS. The Baſſa whereof,at his comming abandoned the ſame,and carrying with him all his treaſure,fled into CYPRVS,which made the taking of the place vnto the victorious Baſſa eaſie, who rifled and ranſackt the ſame: and not content with this conqueſt, forthwith beſieged the great and ſtrong citie of DAMASCO, reſolued to die in the plaines thereof, or to become victorious within the wals of the ſame. During which ſiege the Baſſa of TRIPOLIS had out of the prouinces and countries of the Turks therabouts,raiſed another great armie,and was comming to raiſe the ſiege,and to reſcue the citie. Which misfortune ſo diſmaied the minds of the beſieged, M that deſpairing of all ſuccour and reliefe, they,by the conſent of their Gouernor fell to parley with the enemie,and ſo vpon certaine capitulations yeelded vnto him the place. Whereinto the Baſſa entring,found therein great treaſure,raiſed of the Turkes tributes, whereupon hee ſeized, and by the meanes thereof reſolued to make himſelfe maſter of all SYRIA, the chiefe

A citie whereof he had now in his own power: whereunto he gaue free acceſſe and traffike vnto all the marchants of PERSIA, and of the INDIES.

Now in the time of this his proſperitie, newes was brought him; That the Beglerbeg of NATOLIA had ſent his lieutenant with a great armie againſt him; who knowing that diligence was the ſpirit of conqueſt, and that to conquer was to little purpoſe, without a vigilant care for the preſeruation thereof, reſted not vpon his former good fortune, but marched directly towards his enemies. Wherein his ſucceſſe was anſwerable vnto his deſigne, for within the ſpace of two dayes hee had taken all the paſſages which might giue way vnto his enemies to diſtreſſe him: and in the ſtraits of the mountaines, whereby the enemie was to paſſe, layed a great ambuſh of two thouſand harquebuſiers, and three thouſand horſe, who the enemies B being paſſed, and hee charging them a head, ſet vpon them in the rereward, and brought ſuch a feare vpon them, that hauing made a great fight, in fine they hauing loſt a number of men, were glad to flie, and to leaue the victorie to the Baſſa. And to the encreaſing of his good haps, hee intercepted a ſhippe, caſt by weather vpon that coaſt, laded with great treaſure, bound from ALEXANDRIA to CONSTANTINOPLE, with the tributes of ÆGYPT, belonging to the Great Sultan. Of all which things the Perſian king aduertiſed, ſought to ioyne with him in amitie, highly commending his valiant actes, and ſending vnto him honourable preſents, to wit, a Piſtoll, an Helmet, and a Targuet, all ſet with precious ſtones, eſteemed to bee worth fiftie thouſand crownes. This flame of rebellion ſpread abroad out of SYRIA into CARAMANIA, and ſo farther and farther into the leſſer ASIA: Which C was the cauſe that the Great Sultan ſent with all ſpeede vnto the Viſier Baſſa, then in HVNGARIE, commaunding him, now that STRIGONIVM was taken, which before had hindered the concluding of peace, hee ſhould now vpon reaſonable conditions conclude the ſame, to the end that his affaires on this ſide of his empire, being ſet in quiet and ſecuritie, hee might foorthwith after turne his forces againſt the Perſians, and the rebels in ASIA.

The Beglerbeg of Natolia his lieutenant with his armie diſcomfited by the Baſſa of Aleppo.

But after all theſe great troubles to returne againe into HVNGARIE. The rebels there had of long beſieged the ſtrong towne of NEVVHVSE (as is before declared) which beeing hitherto valiantly defended by the Germane garriſon therein, was now brought to ſuch extremitie, as that it was thought almoſt impoſſible to bee longer defended, the garriſon ſoul- D diours therein, being with often aſſaults for the moſt part ſlaine, and the reſt of them that were left, grieuouſly wounded. Of which ſtrong towne, being as it were the key of that ſide of the countrey, the Turkes which together with the rebels beſieged the ſame, were for the commodious ſituation therof very deſirous: and the rebels therunto as vnwilling, for that it being once in their hand, would hardly euer be again from them recouered. For which cauſe Illiſhaſcius, one of the captaines of the Hungarian rebels then at the ſiege thereof, perceiuing it could not long be kept, to the intent that the Turkes ſhould not by force obtaine the ſame, by letters requeſted of Baſta, the Emperours Lieutenant, though then his enemie, That the towne might bee deliuered vnto Humanoius, another captaine of the Hungarian rebels, leaſt the Turks ſhould by force obtaine the ſame: aſſuring him vpon the perill of his E owne life, and the confiſcation of all his goods to the Emperour, that vpon a reconciliation and peace to bee made betwixt the Emperour and the Hungarians his ſubiects, hee ſhould againe deliuer the ſame towne and fortreſſe into his poſſeſſion. Whereupon by commaundement of the Arch-duke, and of Baſta, the towne was yeelded vp the ſeuenteenth day of the moneth of October, vnto the foreſaid Humanoius, and the Hungarians onely receiued into the towne; yet with this condition, That the Germane ſoldiors which were yet left, and who had valiantly thus long endured the ſiege, might ſtill ſtay in the towne in pay, and keepe watch and ward together with the reſt of the Hungarians, Humanoius hauing commaund ouer them all.

Newhuſe yeelded vnto the Hungarian rebels.

Wherefore the Turkes ſeeing themſelues diſappointed of their purpoſe, for the obtaining F of this ſtrong towne, riſing by night, and not a little diſcontented with the Hungarians, marched towards STRIGONIVM, at the ſiege whereof the Viſier Baſſa lay. Howbeit within a few dayes after, the Hungarians not liking to haue the Germanes in garriſon with them, turned them with their Captaine Strenius out of the towne, and yet ſafely conducted them to COMORA.

At

Altensol yelded to the Hungarian rebels.

At the ſame time they of ALTENSOL, another ſtrong towne of the vpper HVNGARIE, not far G from NEVHVSE, hauing bin long beſieged by the rebels, and driuen for want of victuall to eat their horſes for the ſpace of fiue weeks; and hauing now eaten them all but ſeuen, and nothing elſe left, yeelded themſelues together with their towne to the rebels: as did alſo they of WIGLAS, SHEMNITZ, and CREMNITZ.

In the meane time Botſcay with a verie great armie of his Hungarian rebels, came to TIRNA, a ſtrong towne about ſixteene miles diſtant from VIENNA, attended vpon with a gard of an hundred tall ſouldiours, gallantly apparelled all in blew: a little before whoſe comming, Humanoius, vnto whom NEVHVSE was a little before yeelded, had ſummoned PRESBVRG, requiring the ſame to be yeelded vnto him. Which thing Botſcay, being now come, by H letters likewiſe required of the citizens, threatening otherwiſe moſt ſtraitly to beſiege them. Whereupon Schonberg Gouernour of PRESBVRG, doubting of the faithfulneſſe of the citizens, being almoſt all Hungarians, retired himſelfe with a good part of his ſouldiors into the caſtle; with proteſtation, to ſpend his life and all that hee had for the keeping and defence thereof. With whoſe conſtancie the citizens mooued, continued firme in their allegiance to the emperor. Which Botſcay perceiuing, and that the citie was not to be got by threats, forthwith remoued and went to PESTH, where he was moſt honorably receiued by the Viſier Baſſa and by him preſented with a crowne of curious workmanſhip, and threeſcore thouſand duckats, with fiue and twentie moſt goodly horſes: and there hauing receiued from him full power to entreat of peace, and to conclude the ſame with the Imperialls, with Haly Baſſa and I certaine other of the chiefe of the Turkes ioyned in commiſſion with him, againe departed and went to KIRPA, vnto an aſſembly of the Hungarians there to be holden: whither but a little before Sigiſmund Forgatt was come with the emperors reſolution, concerning the negotiation of peace; when as in the meane time other commiſſioners from the emperour were come to COMORA about the treatie of peace with the Turkes, they themſelues ſo requiring. Howbeit Collonitz at the ſame time by letters writ vnto the Archduke, aduiſing him that this treatie of peace might not, together and at one time, be taken in hand with the Turks and the rebels: but that if it were poſſible, an attonement ſhould bee firſt made with the rebels, and afterward a peace concluded with the Turkes, the common good of the common weale ſo requiring: for that he perceiued the Turkes indeed not to be deſirous of peace at all, but only K to go about, by keeping of the Chriſtians at variance among themſelues, and in ſuſpence betwixt hope and feare, to doe them harme, and themſelues good; which was afterward found to be ſo indeed.

The Perſian King had ſome moneths before ſent three Embaſſadours vnto his Imperiall Maieſtie, who being come at diuers times one after another, were all with peculiar letters diſmiſſed from PRAGE the 29 of Nouember. Vnto the firſt of which embaſſadors letters were giuen, of this purport.

The emperours letters vnto the Perſian king.

Zinel Chan Beg whom your Maieſtie hath ſent embaſſadour vnto vs, we haue willingly ſeene and receiued, and giuen him audience, in declaring of ſuch things as he had from you in charge. It is vnto vs L both acceptable and pleaſing, that your Maieſtie hath regard, ſo friendly to ſalute vs, and ſo carefully to ſeeke to ioyne in amitie and friendſhip with vs, whereby your Maieſtie much bindeth vs vnto the like deſire of mutuall loue and friendſhip; and that we againe on our parts ſhould be readie to performe ſuch things as may be vnto your Maieſtie pleaſing: and that we ſhould wiſh for nothing more, than that our friendſhip ſhould daily more & more be confirmed, and for the common good of vs both, for many yeres preſerued: wherein for our parts we will not bee wanting. Whereas your Maieſtie with great courage hath vndertaken, and with ſo happy ſucceſſe of victories continued your wars againſt the Turk, wherof you had ſo iuſt cauſe, we from our hearts in your behalfe reioyce as all other Chriſtians worthily do: And wee our ſelues are therby much animated valiantly and conſtantly to proceed in our warres, which wee now ſo many yeares haue made with the ſame enemy, nothing doubting, but that God the re- M uenger of wrong will ſo proſper the honourable indeuours of your Maieſtie, as that you ſhall not onely recouer ſuch things as haue beene wrongfully taken from you, but alſo weaken and deſtroy the power of that perfidious enemie. Which that it may the better bee brought to paſſe, wee alſo renue our warres, raiſe greater forces, and by our Embaſſadours and letters exhort and incite the greateſt Chriſtian princes and potentates to extend their power againſt this our common enemie: and

A thereby to giue fitter opportunitie and occaſion vnto your Maieſtie for the better proceeding of your affaires in Asia. The courſe of our notable victories, which we haue in few yeares paſt obtained againſt the Turkes, the tumults and troubles which the Turkes haue by ſecret deuiſes raiſed in Hvngarie, haue ſomewhat hindred: howbeit we hope by Gods permiſſion, that all things ſhall ſhortly bee againe reſtored vnto their former eſtate, ſo that we may wholly without let turne our ſelues with our power againſt the Turks. Yet in the meane time we haue thus much preuailed with the king of Spaine, as that he hath already ſet forth a fleet vnto the borders of his territories, to diſtract his forces: the proſperous ſucceſſe of which fleet wee daily expect. We haue alſo moued the Pope, that he ſhould alſo giue aid in this common cauſe, and excite other princes alſo to doe the like, which hee with great in-

B deuour doth. But concerning ſuch things as ſhall heereafter happen, we ſhall by letters and embaſſadours certifie your Maieſtie as occaſion ſhall require; as at this preſent we had appointed to ſend vnto you the Baron of Dohna, a famous and noble gentleman, who (all things being ready for his iourney) ſodainely dyed: and would now haue ſent another, had not the vnexpected change of the affaires of the Muſcouites otherwiſe diſſwaded vs, wee hauing no other way but that, at this time, to ſend into Persia. For concerning this great Prince, who is now reported there to raigne, what his minde is, or how he ſtandeth affected, we haue as yet no experience. In the meane time we ſo deſire a perpetuall and firme friendſhip to bee eſtabliſhed betwixt vs and your Maieſtie, with a certaine ſecure and free commerce, that if your Maieſtie (which we wiſh) ſhall extend your victories vnto the ſea, your ſubiects may haue free acceſſe and traffique vnto all our kingdomes and dominions. We alſo thanke your Maeſty, that you ſo kindely entertaine the Chriſtians into your kindomes, and graunt to

C them to haue the free exerciſe of their religion: as alſo for that you haue ſent your embaſſadours vnto the king of Fraunce, although without wiſhed ſucceſſe, whereby we eaſily gather your Maieſties great care and circumſpection euerie way. As concerning them whom your Maieſtie hath ſent vnto vs, they haue diligently and faithfully performed their dutie, ſo that they haue deſerued praiſe and fauour both here and in Persia: whom we much commend vnto your Maieſtie, to whom in all things we offer our greateſt loue and affection.

Vnto the ſecond embaſſadour were alſo giuen letters from the Emperour, to this effect.

D Whileſt wee were yet buſied in the diſpatch of Zinel Chan Beg, your Maieſties former embaſſadour, in the meane time Methi Culi Beg, another embaſſadour of yours, came vnto vs, whom we haue courteouſly entertained, and gratiouſly heard: By whoſe ſpeech, as alſo by your Maieſties letters, we haue with exceeding great pleaſure vnderſtood both your friendly greeting of vs, as alſo of the happie ſucceſſe of your affaires againſt the Turkes, ſince the departure of your former embaſſadour, together with your kinde affection towards the Chriſtians in thoſe parts. One of the ſeruants alſo of our embaſſadour which died by the way, hath reported vnto vs, how courteouſly our ſaid embaſſadour was by your Maieſty receiued: and how you haue ſhewed your ſelfe affected againſt the common enemie, which was vnto vs a thing both acceptable and pleaſing. Vnto both which your embaſies the more ſolemnely to anſwer, we had appointed againe to ſend an honourable embaſſage vnto your Maie-

E ſtie, had not thoſe lets and impediments happened, which in our letters giuen vnto your former embaſſadour are declared. But ſo ſoone and as often as may be, we will indeuour either by letters or by embaſſadours, more at large to manifeſt our loue and affection towards you. Wherfore we greatly deſire that your Maieſty may continue in perfect amitie with vs, and valiantly proceed in ſubduing of the common enemie; we on our part being ready to performe all things whereby we may teſtifie vnto you the deſire we haue for the preſeruation of our mutuall loue and friendſhip; as alſo of our indeuors in our wars againſt him. God almightie long preſerue your Maieſtie in health, and make you ſtill victorious againſt the common enemie.

Vnto the third embaſſadour were likewiſe letters giuen from the F Emperour, of this purpoſe.

Whereas Ius Baſſi Haſſan Beg, your Maieſties embaſſador vnto the French King, came this way at the ſame time that other two of your embaſſadours were here preſent with vs, we receiued him with the ſame courteſie wherewith we receiued them, making ſtay of him, vntill that they might all three be together diſmiſſed. And for becauſe that his embaſſage was vndertaken for the furtherance of the common good, although it wanted the wiſhed ſucceſſe, yet we haue thought it good to giue thankes vnto your Maieſtie therefore, and in moſt friendly manner to greet you by this your ſaid embaſſadour, whom wee highly commend vnto you, for that for the time he here ſtayed in our Court, he ſo behaued himſelfe, as that he well deſerued both our and your Maieſties fauour, whereof we wiſh him to be partaker. Almightie God bleſſe your Maieſtie with all felicitie, and long to his good pleaſure preſerue the ſame. G

The Turkes and Hungarian rebels by the Imperials ouerthrowne.

Theſe embaſſadors with theſe letters thus diſmiſſed, one of them went into POLONIA, H and there declared vnto the king the great loue and affection of the Perſian king towards him, offering vnto him al loue and kindneſſe: firſt requeſting him, That he would joyne with his Majeſtie in all friendſhip and brotherly loue: and then, that hee would take vp armes againſt the Turke their common enemie: promiſing on his maſters behalfe, That hee ſhould not lay downe armes vntill that enemie were vtterly brought to nought and deſtroyed, ſo that the Chriſtian princes would on the other ſide likewiſe impugne him. This was a ſtrange meſſage, and not before heard of in POLONIA, where, for all that, the meſſenger was courteouſly and bountifully entertained, and afterward with good words put in hope of obtaining what he had requeſted, was ſo honourably diſmiſſed.

But leauing theſe embaſſadours vnto their long journey: to returne againe into HVNGA- I RIE. A great number of the Turkes and Hungarian rebels meeting together at HIDVVEG, had a purpoſe ſecretly to haue ſurpriſed & oppreſſed the Imperiall ſouldiors in their campe: Of which their purpoſe they in good time aduertiſed, and therfore keeping good watch and ward, ſo receiued the Turks and rebels at their comming, contrary to their expectation, as that after a ſmall fight they cauſed them to betake themſelues to flight: whom the Imperialls ſo hotly purſued towards CANISIA, that they ſlew of them aboue 1000, tooke about 200 more of them priſoners, with 1500 horſe which they caried away with them. And ſo hauing left ſufficient garriſons on that ſide of the country towards CANISIA, returned themſelues towards VIENNA. In the meane time the Commiſſioners from the Emperour being met together at COMORA, about the treatie of peace with the Turks and the Hungarians, the ſixt of K

The treaty of peace with the Turkes and rebels begun.

December receiuing letters from the Baſſa of BADA, certaine of them the next day after went by water downe the riuer of Daubius to BVDA: where they being honourably receiued, and hauing much & long talk with the Baſſa concerning a peace, found little difficultie therin, but that the Turks ſaid they could thereof determine nothing, without the preſence and conſent of the Hungarians. With which anſwer they ful of hope returned back again to COMORA, as did alſo Sigiſmund Forgat with the like hope of peace from Botſcay. At which time Botſcay being about to depart from the aſſembly at KIRPAY, backe againe to CASSOVIA, gaue power and authority to Illiſhaſchius for the furthering of the treatie for peace: who hauing receiued letters of ſafe conduct from the Archduke Matthias, about the end of December, together with his wife went to VIENNA: who being admitted vnto the Archdukes preſence, and L hauing had an houre and halfes talke with him, and euerie day after conferred with the counſellors from eight a clocke to twelue, at length compoſed all difficulties and differences touching the treaty of peace, excepting fiue articles onely concerning religion, the free exerciſe wherof the Hungarians in any wiſe required, ſo that now men began to conceiue ſome good hope of a peace to be in time concluded.

1606 This yere thus ending with the beginning of the treaty for peace, the next yere begun with the wonted troubles of war, the rebellious Haiduckes in HVNGARIE doing great harme in the vpper HVNGARIE, tyrannizing after their wonted maner vpon men of all ſort and condition. Where giuing diuers aſſaults vnto diuers cities, they being valiantly repulſed, were conſtrained to retire (the Polonians and Coſſacks defending the ſame) yet did they neuertheleſſe no M little harme vnto the countrey inhabitants. Whereof complaint being made vnto the king of POLONIA, hee by his embaſſador ſent to Botſcay at CASSOVIA, obtained, that thoſe ſpoyling Haiducks ſhould be called backe againe out of theſe parts.

Now had Illiſhaſchius the negotiator for the treaty of peace to be made with the rebels, ſo well

A well dealt in that matter, as that the ſame, in the later end of Ianuarie ſhould haue been publiſhed at VIENNA, but that certaine of the chiefe of the Clergie could not be brought to conſent, that the free exerciſe of religion ſhould indifferently be granted to all the people in generall, but to the Nobilitie only. Whereupon Illiſhaſchius with the reſt of the Commiſſioners for the Hungarians, with great diſcontentment being about to returne home againe without any thing at all concluded, the deputies for the Emperour ſeeing that it could not be otherwiſe brought to paſſe, at length agreed (although neuer ſo much contrarie to the liking of the clergie men) to ſatisfie the Hungarians in this their requeſt, and that the free exerciſe as well of the reformed, as of the Romiſh religion, ſhould be permitted to all men throughout all HVNGARIE, in ſuch ſort as it had before beene in the time of the Emperors Maximilian and Ferdinand. Concerning which point for the libertie of the religion, letters were deliuered to Illiſhaſchius, all the other points concerning the peace being put off vnto the next aſſemblie of the States of HVNGARIE, ſhortly after to be holden at PRESBVRG.

The free exerciſe of religion granted to the Hungarians.

About the beginning of March the Spahi at CONSTANTINOPLE had requeſted of the Viſier Baſſa, That it might be lawfull for themſelues to take vp their woonted penſion of the farmers and huſbandmen here and there in the countrie: which although it were vnto them by the Viſier Baſſa denied, who had commaundement from the Great Sultan within a few daies after, to giue euery one of them his preſent pay in money; yet they not ſo contented, but going out of the citie preſumptuouſly preſumed to trouble the countrie men, and to do
C the farmers great harme. For which their inſolencie the great Sultan, the chiefe captains and leaders of them being againe returned into the citie, cauſed them ſome to be beheaded, ſome to be hanged, and otherſome to be bound in chaines and drowned: whereby no ſmall feare was ſtrucke into the reſt of the common ſoldiors. But the rebellion in ASIA ſtill encreaſing, and the rebels there ſecretly both fauouring and furthering the proceedings of the Perſian king, the Sultan forthwith ſent for the Viſier Baſſa, who the laſt yeare had ſerued in HVNGARIE, to go into ASIA, to repreſſe the rebels there, and alſo to withſtand the proceedings of the Perſian king: committing in the meane time the managing of the war in HVNGARIE vnto his lieutenant.

The Sphai inſolently oppreſſing the countrie people, iuſtly puniſhed.

The treatie of peace both with the Turks and the rebels, was yet in hand, whereunto how D much the Turkes were for their part inclined, the garriſon ſoldiors of RAB had good proofe. For the eighteenth day of March, being the day at their requeſt appointed for the treatie, and whereon the Commiſſioners on both parts there meeting together, ſhould haue furthered the negotiation of the peace, not paſt fiftie of the Turks comming to the gate of the towne, required to be let in, as if they had come for that purpoſe. Whom our men nothing ſuſpecting, were about to receiue them into the towne; when as a ſentinell without the towne, it being a thicke miſt, perceiued 3000 more of the Turks lurking there by, and forthwith giuing an alarme to thoſe of the towne, bewrayed the enemies treacherie, who thereupon retired, they of the towne diſcharging their great ordnance after them. The next moneth, about the beginning of Aprill, certaine meſſengers came from EPERIA (a citie of the vpper E HVNGARIE, yet holden for the Emperour) to VIENNA, declaring the moſt miſerable ſtate of that citie: which although the way thereunto being three or foure weeks before opened, it had receiued ſome good ſtore of victuall, yet now (as they ſaid) was ſo on euery ſide by the rebels beſet, as that no prouiſion at all could more therunto come: hoping by that means to bring to paſſe, that the citizens pinched with hunger and want of things neceſſarie, ſhould at length yeeld themſelues together with the citie into their power. By which meanes they but a little before had obtained the ſtrong towne of TOKAY: wherin the famine was ſo great, that the ſouldiours had not onely eaten their ſhooes and leather ierkins, but had now alſo kild two boyes to eat, and ſome others of them had caſt lots among themſelues, which ſhould be kild for the other to eat. By which extremitie Ruber the Gouernor of the place, was enforced to F yeeld: vnto whom Botſcay, who then lay at CASSOVIA, is ſaid to haue offered a great ſumme of money, with many other good things, to haue taken his part; all which he moſt conſtantly refuſed, proteſting euen vnto death to continue faithfull in his obedience to the Emperour.

Rab attempted to haue beene by the Turkes ſurpriſed.

Eperia by the rebels diſtreſſed

Tokay by the rebels taken.

The letters of Illiſhaſchius ſent to a notable man of Vienna.

About the ſame time Illiſhaſchius who had before not a little laboured about the furthering of the peace in HVNGARIE, writ letters from CASSOVIA vnto a certaine great man at VIENNA; whereby he declared that Botſcay without the conſent of the eſtates of HVNGARIE could of himſelfe determine nothing, concerning the concluſion of the peace: who had oft times told him to his face, that rather than they would againe ſubmit themſelues to a forreine gouernour, they would for euer put themſelues vnder the Turkes protection: and yet promiſed by the ſame letters, that although he had got vnto himſelfe great diſpleaſure thereby with the Haiducks, he would not for all that ceaſe by all means to draw the ſtates of the countrie in their next aſſembly vnto his part, ſo that that which was before concluded at VIENNA concerning religion ſhould not againe be reuerſed: for many of them (as hee ſaid) were afraid that it would not be performed which was there promiſed vnto the ſtates concerning the exerciſe of their religion. And that therefore they could not yet bee perſuaded to put themſelues from vnder the Turkes protection, vntill they ſaw themſelues ſufficiently ſecured, both for the libertie of their religion and the keeping of their ancient priuiledges. And that they could not, nor would not indure a forraine gouernour to rule ouer them, with whom they could not talke; nor yet ſuffer clergie men to haue any voyces in their ciuill affaires. And therefore (he ſaid) he thought it very neceſſarie that the Emperour ſhould not doubt in this point to gratifie the Hungarians. And that TRANSILVANIA, whereupon he had bin hitherto inforced to beſtow ſo great coſt for the keeping therof, being now left vnto Botſcay, hee ſhould appoint ſuch a gouernor ouer HVNGARIE as the States of that countrie ſhould require. For that there was no hope of any peace to be made with the Turkes, except Botſcay and the States of HVNGARIE ſhould vndertake the treatie thereof; ſeeing that they but only ſeeking for a peace in ſhew, were oft time diſcouered but to ſeeke for their own aduantages and profits.

Illiſhaſchius reproachfully vſed by the Hungarians.

But concerning Illiſhaſchius himſelfe, the Hungarian rebels ſeeing him ſo much to labour about the concluding of a peace, in ſcorne called him by the by-name of Cripeliſhacius, as he that too much inclined vnto the Germans; which by-name he tooke in ſo ill part, as that hee departed ſtraight to EPERIA with a purpoſe not to haue bin preſent at the next aſſemblie of the States: but being againe pacified, and by Botſcay called backe, hee made ſuch a notable ſpeech vnto the ſtates in their next aſſemblie, that all men now began both to hope and wiſh more for peace than they had before done.

In the meane time the Turks in great number being gathered together to BELGRADE, expected the end of this treatie for peace, and letters from the great Sultan to Botſcay were intercepted alſo: whereby hee aduiſeth him to proceed in his purpoſe, and ioyning with his powers, to ſeize vpon AVSTRIA, BOHEMIA, and MORAVIA; for that he could be contented with HVNGARIE and TRANSYLVANIA, and leaue the reſt of the prouinces vnto Botſcay as his inheritance.

The Haiducks incenſed againſt the Turks and Tartars, truſt neither of them.

The Tartars about this time were about to make a road into POLONIA, but when as they with their oft incurſions had not a little troubled the Haiducks alſo in the vpper HVNGARIE, they reſolued among themſelues to ioyne their forces together, and to fight as well againſt the Turkes as the Tartars, and from thenceforth neither to truſt the one nor the other.

Heereupon, when as the Turkes in great number came to aſſault LIPPA, a towne of the Haiduckes, they forſaking the towne, fortified the caſtle with certaine companies of armed men, and afterwards beſtowed many others here and there in caues and cellars in the towne, and layed great ſtore of gunpowder in the ſtreets. Vnto which towne the Turkes comming, and finding the gates open, and none to reſiſt them, haſted to haue taken the caſtle. But in the meane time, the powder which the Haiduckes had layed taking fire, blew vp a number of them, and they which lay hid in the caues and cellars forthwith breaking out, ſlew of them whomſoeuer they met, and ſo made of the Turkes a great ſlaughter, and againe cleered the towne.

The Eſtates of AVSTRIA conſidering the great harmes they had in theſe late troubles receiued, aſwel from the Hungarian rebels, as from the emperors mutinous ſoldiors, and by experience taught how daungerous a thing it was for them to reſt vpon other mens protection, being

A being vnto them ſtrangers: reſolued now in a general aſſemblie of the Eſtates by them about this time holden to take vpon themſelues the defence of their countrie, againſt ſuch ſudden incurſions and tumults of the mutinous ſoldiors, and no more to relie vpon forain protection, ſtill to ſeek when they had moſt need thereof. Wherfore to aſſure themſelues in their own ſtrength they with a generall conſent agreed to haue alwaies in readines two thouſand horſmen & eight thouſand footmen, to be maintained of the common charge; fiftie of the countrie peſants ſtill finding of one of the ſaid ſouldiors.

The inhabitants of Auſtria prouide to ſtand vpon their own ſtrength for the defence of their owne countrie.

And much about this time, viz. the third of Iune Illiſhaſchius a great man amongſt the rebels and yet the greateſt furtherer of the peace, (as appeared by his doings and by that wee B haue before of him written) hauing before obtained letters of ſafe conduct from the Archducke, came now againe with his wife alſo to VIENNA, there more at large to conferre vpon the articles for a peace to bee concluded, with ſuch as were on the Emperours behalfe for that purpoſe deputed. Where comming to conferre and talke vpon the matter, hee was ſo croſſed by Nicholas Biſhop of VIENNA who hitherto had been preſent in Counſell together with the reſt of the Commiſſioners (a great enemie vnto the peace in reſpect of the article concerning the libertie of Religion) hee was I ſay by him ſo croſſed, as that there was no hope of any thing to bee for the common quiet concluded, ſo long as he was there preſent. For which cauſe he on both ſides and of all men deſirous of the peace diſliked, was in the Archdukes name willed no more to come into the Counſell for the diſturbing of the C peace. In which negotiation for the concluding of the peace Illiſhaſchius had taken ſuch paines in trauelling to and fro betwixt the Archduke then liuing at VIENNA and Botſcay with the States of HVNGARIE then lying at CASSOVIA, and ſo debated the matter on both ſides, that all things being as good as agreed vpon, for a full concluſion of all matters, he himſelfe, together with George Humanoius, Francis Magott, Sebaſtian Tockell, Staniſlaus Turſon, and others, with two hundred horſe, and two and thirtie waggons, in all foure hundred perſons, the ſeuenth of September came to VIENNA with fiftie Huſſars following of them: ſhortly after whoſe comming the treatie for peace was earneſtly begun with often meſſengers paſſing to and fro betwixt VIENNA and CASSOVIA to Botſcay lying then verie daungerouſly ſicke, vntill that all the articles of peace were neere about the foureteenth of September ful-
D ly on both parts agreed vpon: moſt difference ariſing about the article for the free exerciſe of religion. For although it was before declared that men might haue the free exerciſe of religion: yet the Hungarians recalling that generall word of religion vnto a particularitie, would needs haue it ſet down that men might haue the free exerciſe of thoſe religions which are at this day called the Lutheran, Caluinian, and Romiſh religion: neither would they conclude any peace vntill they were of their requeſt in that point ſatisfied. Which peace ſo concluded the next day after the Deputies for the Hungarians ſent an Embaſſador to the Viſier Baſſa at BVDA to certifie him of all their proceedings, and to requeſt him not as yet to attempt any thing for the diſturbing of the peace: Now the articles whereupon the peace was concluded were theſe:

A peace concluded betwixt the Emperour and his diſcontented ſubiects of the vpper Hungarie

Firſt, That from thenceforth it ſhould be lawfull for euery man throughout the kingdome of Hungarie to haue the free vſe of his religion, and to beleeue what he would.

2 That if the Hungarians ſo thought good, they might chuſe a Palatine for their Gouernour, and that in the meane time the Archduke Matthias ſhould no more vſe the title of a Gouernour, but of a Viceroy.

4 That the Biſhops that were nobly deſcended in HVNGARIE and had lands of their owne, ſhould from thenceforth be admitted into the Counſell, but the other biſhops not ſo to be receiued.

5 That Botſcay for himſelfe and his heires male ſhould for euer hold TRANSYLVANIA.

F 6 That the ſame countrie of TRANSYLVANIA ſhould be ſtill ſubiect vnto the Kingdome of HVNGARIE.

7 That for his Armes he ſhould beare three royall Crownes and three open Helmets.

8 That he ſhould no more afterwards ſtile himſelfe Prince, but Lord of part of the Kingdome of HVNGARIE.

9 That they ſhould pay the Haiduckes their wages which had leuied them. G

10 That the harmes done on both ſides ſhould for euer be forgotten.

11 That Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia, Lavsnisivm, and Avstria, ſhould not onely with their letters and ſeales confirme the articles, but alſo ſweare at Vienna to keepe the ſame ſo far as ſhould concerne them.

12 That the Hungarians ſhould likewiſe ſend ſome to Vienna, who in their behalfe ſhould with their letters, ſeales and oathes, confirme and ratifie theſe articles.

13 That the aſſemblie of the Eſtates of Hvngarie, ſhould be referred vntill a more conuenient time for them.

14 That all theſe things being done, this agreement ſhould be publickely confirmed and inrolled in H the records of the kingdome of Hvngarie.

15 That it ſhould be lawfull for the Hungarians, by their embaſſadours to inuite the princes of the Empire, to the approuing and confirming of theſe articles.

Which fifteene articles were on the Emperours part ſubſcribed by Trauſam, Mollart, Sigiſrid, Pruner, Lichtenſtein, and Kreuberge: and on the part of the Hungarians, by Illiſhaſchius, Peter Erdkod, George Turſo, and Sigiſmund Forgat, and others.

The twentith of September following, the embaſſador for the Hungarians and of Botſcay, being admitted vnto the preſence of the Archduke Matthias, obtained of him pardon for the forepaſſed rebellion, and all that was therein done: vnto whom ſecuritie for I the ſame was afterward giuen by the prouinces, thereby alſo to aſſure them, that they ſhould not be therefore afterwards troubled. But yet for all that was before done, the title of the Prince of Transylvania was left vnto Botſcay for terme of his life: who feeling his ſickneſſe daily to encreaſe, would oft times ſay, That he could willingly die, ſo that it might pleaſe God, before his death, to giue him leaue to excuſe himſelfe of his rebellion before the whole Romane Empire: and ſo about the end of September all the aforeſaid embaſſadours for the Hungarians and Botſcay, being aſſembled into the caſtle of Vienna, together with the Emperours Counſell, and certaine other noblemen of the prouinces belonging to the Emperour, receiued euerie one of them the articles of the peace copied out, and faire written in parchment: which done, they returned euerie one to his owne dwel- K ling. But Illiſhaſchius went from thence to Nevhvse, to bee preſent at the peace to bee afterwards made with Turkes alſo, from whence hee afterwards writ letters vnto the Viſier Baſſa, to requeſt him, not as yet to attempt any thing againſt the Emperors prouinces, but peaceably and quietly to expect his Commiſſioners, which were ſhortly to come vnto him.

But in the meane time whileſt this peace was thus in concluding, certaine Tartars at Constantinople, in their inſolencie ſet fire vpon a certaine Iewes houſe, wherof aroſe ſuch a terrible fire, as burnt not onely many houſes, but a great number of the Iewes themſelues alſo: the harme there done being eſteemed at fortie hundred thouſand duckats. In which tumult and noiſe of the people running to and fro, and quenching of the fire the great Sultan L hauing a fall from his horſe, was thereof for a while ſicke.

The Turkes ſeeking to ſurpriſe others, themſelues ſurpriſed

The Turkes of Canisia alſo hauing conſpired with the captaine of the leſſer Comora, came to haue ſurpriſed the ſame. But the garriſon ſouldiors there, hauing before had a ſuſpition thereof, ſuffered ſo many of the Turks as they knew they were able to ouercome, to enter; and ſo ſhutting the gates of the citie, kild them euery mothers ſonne, the reſt which were without returning againe to Canisia.

The Commiſſioners for the emperop, to entreat of peace with the Turks come to Presburge.

Peace thus (as is aforeſaid) concluded with the Hungarians, George Turſon, Nicholas Iſtuan, Iohn Mollart, and Althem, with ſome others, the Emperors Commiſſioners for a peace to bee made with the Turkes, went to Comora; Sigifrid Collonitz and Budin following them with the armie; for as yet the ſaid Commiſſioners durſt not altogether truſt the Turks M for intercepting of them by the way. Which Commiſſioners carried with them Solyman the Baſſa of Byda, who had now beene ſeuen yeares kept priſoner in the caſtle of Vienna, and Aly Baſſa, both brauely apparrelled in blew ſilke; ſix wagons following of them, wherin were carried certaine preſents for the great Sultan, to witt, a moſt curious cloke, certaine

A taine faire peeces of plate, an hundred thousand duckats, with diuers other things of great value.

But whilest they there stayed, expecting to heare from the Visier Bassa then at BVDA, a suddaine insolent accident fell out, like ynough to haue broken off againe the peace, already made with the Hungarians, as also to haue vtterly cut off the treatie of peace to bee had with the Turks, and to haue set them all together by the eares againe. For albeit that the first article of the peace made with the Hungarians, was, That euery man should haue the free exercise of his religion, yet the 8 day of October, about three of the clocke in the afternoone, when as a certaine Hungarian Lutheran preacher was in the pulpit preaching to the people in a church, B in the suburbs of COMORA, Buchem and Kneuie, two captaines, comming from dinner with certaine of their seruants more than halfe drunke, with their swords drawn rusht in the Church, and draue out thence the preacher, vpon whom captaine Buchem his trumpeter also discharged a pistoll, and raised such a tumult in the church, that diuers children were troden to death vnderfoot, and the rest put in great feare of their liues.

The peace already concluded with the Hungarians, like enough to haue againe bin broken off through the insolencie of some few disordered persons.

Which insolent fact so mooued the Hungarians, that Turson and Budian, there present with the rest of the Commissioners, readie to haue gone about the treatie of the peace, would needs the next day haue departed from COMORA, and were hardly by Mollart and Collonitz entreated to stay, Buchem and Kneuie the two captaines being bound to their appearance for the answering of the matter, and the trumpeter with yrons on his heeles clapt in prison. But C the newes hereof being carried to NEVHVSEL, and (as the manner of reports is) by fame made farre greater than it was, as that an hundred and fiftie persons was slaine in the church, there arose such a tumult among the Hungarians there, as that Illishaschius with the rest of the captains had much ado to quiet and appease the same: who ioyning with the Turkes of STRIGONIVM, and the Haiducks of the Island, had determined now by night to haue inuaded COMORA, where the outrage was committed, had not Pogranius the elder (a man of great grauitie) comming from thence, declared vnto Illishaschius and the rest of the captaines all the matter as it was done, vpon whose relation the whole tumult was again appeased. But forasmuch as the two aforesaid captaines, bound to their appearance, were by night fled from COMORA to VIENNA, the Hungarians were very earnest to haue them seuerely punished, as breakers of D the first article of the peace concerning religion. Botscay in the meane time beheaded Catayus his Chauncellor, who had gone about to huue poysoned him, in hope after his death to haue been prince of TRANSYLVANIA himselfe, placing Iohn Ianusy in his stead, and giuing him Catay his lands.

Botscay causeth his Chancellor to be beheaded.

Peace now made with the Hungarians (as is aforesaid) and Commissioners appointed for a treatie of peace to be had with the Turkes also (wherunto the Visier Bassa then lying at BVDA was as forward as any, being so commanded from the great Sultan his master) there wanted but a place commodious for the said Commissioners, without suspition of danger, and indifferent for them all to meet in. Whereupon Cæsar Gallen, a man of great experience in such matters, with some other captaines, were appointed to find out some such conuenient place E for them to meet in: who hauing viewed many, at length made choise of one within halfe a league of COMORA, so fit for that purpose, as if nature had prouided it for the same. The great riuer of Danubius being there diuided into diuers parts, made therin three islands, all compassed round with the armes thereof, into which Islands the Commissioners for the Emperour, for the Turke, and for the Hungarians, might come without let one of another to entreat of their affaires, and so in little boats prepared for that purpose passe ouer one to another, as their occasions required. Into this place, so commodious for all three parties, the deputies for the Emperor the fiue and twentith day of October came, conducted by the horsmen of MANSFELD, HOHENLO, and BONCHIMIN. After whom followed Illishaschius, and the other deputies for the Hungarians, assisted with the nobilitie of HVNGARIE, all attending the comming of the F Great Sultans Commissioners; who likewise immediatly after came, being brought vp the riuer in foure and twentie braue ships well appointed.

The Commissioners for the Emperor, the Turks, and the Hungarians meet together to entreat of a peace.

These Commissioners being thus apart arriued in the Islands, began first to consult by themselues euery one of their seueral affaires and businesses, and afterwards many times meeting together, with much grauitie consulted and conferred of the best wayes and meanes for the

the making of a good and assured peace for the appeasing of these warres: which euery one of them, and all together, to that end imploying the vttermost of their endeauors, at last the 19 of Nouember it was betwixt all the three parties fully agreed vpon and concluded, and hostages on on all parts giuen one to another, with oaths and promises solemnly on all sides giuen and receiued for the inuiolate keeping and obseruing of the same: the articles whereupon the said peace was concluded being these. G

Articles of the peace concluded betwixt the emperour and the great Sulan.

First, That the Emperour and the great Sultan in all their Letters, Dispatches, Instruments, and Embassages, should not stile themselues by any other names or additions, but by the names of Welbeloued Father and Sonne, to wit, the Emperour calling the great Sultan his Sonne, and the great Sultan the Emperour (in respect of his yeares) his Father. H

That in the beginning of their letters they should take vpon them the name and qualitie of Emperor, and not of King, respectiuely one of them to another.

That these two Emperors should take order, that the realm of Hvngarie and the Archdukedome of Avstria might bee in rest, peace, and tranquilitie, and altogether deliuered and assured from all incursions, oppressions, and outrages of the men of war on both parties.

That it should be lawfull for the king of Spaine, if he so thought good, to enter into this treatie of peace, without the opposition or let of one or of the other of both these Emperors in any sort.

That the Tartars and all other people, vsually wont to come in armes into Hvngarie, should be comprised within this treatie of the peace, so to be disarmed of all power, by their armes to doe harme within I the realme of Hvngarie, and they there assured from their violences and robberies.

That euery one both on the one part and on the other should forbeare from making incursions and pillages, and enterprises of war, and from all actes of hostilitie one against another; and yet euery one neuertheless to haue power to pursue theeues and robbers, and such others seeking after bootie, to the disturbing of the peace, and iniurying of the commonweale: whereof euery man should haue power to giue knowledge, to the intent by common force to suppresse them, and to cause them to recompence the wrongs and harmes by them done.

That all places, castles, townes and forts should remaine without attempt either on the one part or on the other, whether it were by force, surprize, or treason, and so likewise the goods, families, and cattell of the countrymen, which were of their territories and iurisdiction, Botscay stil holding all that was lately to him graunted by the treatie of Vienna. K

That all prisoners taken in the warres should be set at libertie, but especially such as had beene taken in townes and citadels, which by their valour and courage they sought to haue defended, and the other prisoners to bee deliuered by exchange and ransome, as should bee most expedient and easie for both parties.

That all controuersies happening as well on this side as beyond the riuer of Dannbius, should be peaceably ended by the iudgement of the gouernor of Rab, of the Bassa of Bvda, of the gouernor of Sclavonia, and of the gouernours of other places; and that if they should chaunce to be of such important weight and consequence, as that they could not by these Magistrates bee determined and composed, that they should in that case be reserued to be decided by their Imperiall Maiesties: and that it should be lawfull both for the one partie and the other to repaire and build the places ruined, but not to build places of new, which might preiudice either the one part or the other. L

That Amurath the Visier Bassa should send his messengers with presents to the Archduke Mathias, and that the Emperour should dispatch an embassador toward the great Sultan with 200000 duckats, and that the great Sultan likewise should send his embassador to Prage, with great and rich presents to the Emperour.

That this peace should begin in the yeare 1607, and continue for the space of twentie yeares, and that one of the Emperours should send vnto the other euery three yeares their embassadours with their honourable and rich presents, according to the pleasure and power of their Maiesties.

That all the Emperours successors, as also those of the kingdome of Hvngarie, should bee comprehended within this agreement of peace, together with all their kinsmen, allies, and confederates, as likewise those of the Great Sultans also. M

A vnto the Great Sultan, yet ſo, as that no man ſhould bee with any new tribute oppreſſed: and that ſuch as had before bin free from paying of tribute, ſhould ſtill keepe the ſame priuiledges.

And that the Turkes ſhould not exact their tributes by the poynt of their ſwords, but by the way of iuſtice, which they ſhould commit vnto the diſcretion of Iudges and receiuers, to that end appointed, that ſo it might bee paid without oppreſſing of the people, except happily they which ſhould pay it, vpon preſumption ſhould denie it, or too long deferre the payment of it, in which caſe it ſhould bee lawfull both for the one ſide and the other to vſe ſuch meanes as ſhould ſeeme vnto them good for the obtaining thereof.

Theſe are the articles of this peace, which God turne to the glorie of his name and the be- Great ioy and triumph in Hungary for the peace concluded with the Turke.

The commiſſioners themſelues in token of their conceiued ioy, magnificently feaſted one another alſo; which the Turkes firſt began, and not content to haue made them great cheere, gaue vnto our Commiſſioners great preſents alſo: for the Baſſa of BVDA gaue vnto Mollart, Althem, Turſon, Iſtuan, Collonitz, Budian, Hendoc, Cæſar Gallen, and Eleſchin, braue and couragious horſes moſt gallantly furniſhed; and to the reſt exceeding rich garments and taeſtrie hangings of great value. And as at the time of this feaſt, the troope of Mansfeld had by many ſallies and vollies of ſhot giuen great pleaſure vnto the Turkes as they ſate at the table Alla Baſſa to C declare the contentment and pleaſure hee had therein receiued, ſent to the captaine of this troope 200 duckats, which he would not accept, requeſting in ſtead of them to haue deliuered vnto him a certain captaine by the Turks then kept priſoner, whom the Baſſa cauſed freely to be deliuered vnto him, and with all ſent backe againe the two hundred duckats to be deuided among the ſouldiours, which for all that Mansfeld refuſed, ſending them backe againe vnto the Baſſa. After which actions of ioy and peace, euery man returned home well content and pleaſed.

baſſadors to CONSTANTINOPLE, certifying the great Sultan of the peace now made with the Chriſtians, who thereof conceauing great ioy, with a number of Ianizaries, and others
D in great magnificence went to the church to giue thanks therefore vnto his prophet Mahomet, and ſpent the next day with great ſport and pleaſure, purpoſing from thenceforth to turne all his force and power for the ſuppreſſing of his rebels in ASIA, and the ſubduing of the Perſian king.

Now albeit that there was a peace of late concluded with the Hungarians at VIENNA (as The Haiducks begin new ſtirr in Hungaria. is before declared) yet diuers ſtirres and tumults were neuertheleſſe by the Haiducks in diuers places of the vpper HVNGARIE ſtill raiſed: inſomuch, that about the end of Nouember the inhabitants of the countie of BOCOTSIE were through their inſolencies enforced to ioyne battell with them, wherein a number were on both ſides ſlaine, and three countrey villages burnt: ſo that as it ſhould ſeeme no peace can be ſo well and indifferently made, but that ſome will bee
E ſtill troubling and impugning the ſame.

Shortly after, viz. the thirteenth of December, Botſcay calling together an aſſembly of the Botſcay calleth an aſſembly of the States of Hungary, and inſtructeth them what to doe at their next generall aſſembly.
Eſtates of HVNGARIE, propounded to them to bee conſidered of, firſt, That the late reuolt, almoſt generally made throughout all HVNGARIE, with all the ſtirres and troubles thereby raiſed, had all beene hitherto to no other end made, but for the defence of their religion, and the maintenance of their auncient libertie: Then, that whereas they by their generall good liking had made choice of him for their Prince, and that hitherto he had done nothing without their knowledge and conſent: and that euen now at this preſent he was by their conſent readie to depart from the caſtles and free cities in the vpper HVNGARIE, and had now ſent his letters vnto the Archduke Matthias, for the ſending of his deputies to receiue them; whether F he ſhould from thencefoorth relinquiſh the title of a prince, or not. And that for as much as no warre could be made without great harme doing, that he would therfore for the auoiding of farther troubles about ſuch matters, that a decree ſhould bee made, That all ſuch wrongs and iniuries ſhould be forgiuen and forgotten, and that euery man ſhould ſtill hold all ſuch goods, goods, whether they were moueable or immoueable, during the time of this late warre. Hee G wished them also in the next generall assembly of the States, with all their power and endeauour to vrge the repealing of the article concerning the burning of heretickes, with all other articles contrary to their religion: and not to remit any thing concerning the choice of their Palatine, as had in former time beene vsed: neither in this next generall assembly of the Estates to neglect any thing which might seeme to concerne their priuiledges and liberty. And that therefore they should be carefull to send thither wise and powerfull men, such as should not easily be ouercome with the clamours and outcries of the contrarie part. At length hee wished them to consider of this also, how a true and sincere confederation might be made betwixt HVNGARIE and TRANSYLVANIA, so that a safe and quiet traffique and commerce might H in both places be vsed.

Botscay dieth at Cassouia.

These things thus done, Botsay his sickneſſe still more and more encreasing vpon him, so at length preuailed, that it made an end of him, to the great sorrow and griefe of all the people in generall, who had him in great honor and regard. He died at CASSOVIA the 30 of December, in the yeare 1606. He was honorably descended, and a man of a great spirit, ambitious, wise, and politike, a great louer of his countrey, but an extreame enemy vnto the Germanes, and their gouernment in HVNGARIE.

A little before his death he earnestly perſuaded Iohn Iansie his Chancellour to continue in his allegeance vnto the Emperour, and not to raise new stirres, or so much as in him was not to suffer any to bee raised. Neuertheleſſe, such his wholesome counsell not regarded, there I were some, who immediatly after his death were about to haue raised new forces, for to haue seized vpon TRANSYLVANIA, and so to haue stirred vp new troubles. For preuenting wherof, Matthias the Archduke forthwith sent a messenger vnto the States of the vpper HVNGARIE, aduising them, That the great harmes and miseries considered which that part of HVNGARIE had of late felt and endured, almost to the vtter ruine and destruction thereof (which proceeded not so much from the wars with the Turkes, as from their owne ciuill tumults and seditions) they should from thenceforth giue themselues to quietneſſe & peace, and not againe insolently to prescribe vnto the Emperour what to do, or how he was to dispose of the country of TRANSILVANIA; assuring them, that the Emperour would not hereafter winke at such their rebellious plots and deuices, but foorthwith turne all his power and forces to the vtter destruction and rooting out of such rebellious and seditious persons, the disturbers of the common K peace and quiet. By which the Archdukes warning, some, otherwise ready enough to haue raised new stirs and troubles, were not therin so forward as otherwise haply they would haue been, but kept themselues quiet.

The Emperour not tobe blamed formaking peace with the Turke.

Now many there were (and yet are) which much maruelled, that the Christian Emperour would thus make peace with the great Sultan (as is aforesaid) he being then so much troubled with warres, both against his owne rebels, and the Persian king in ASIA, most part of his forces being turned that way; so that a fitter time, or of more aduantage, could not haue been wished for the Emperour to haue done great matters against him in, and not onely to haue holden his owne (which he did not) in HVNGARIE, but to haue recouered some good part of his L losses there before receiued also. And indeed true it is, that the time then well serued for both: but what auaileth opportunitie without power? And had the Hungarians (the greatest strength the Emperour hath hitherto had for the defence of that little which is yet left of that so great a kingdome) been at quiet and at his commaund, and he himselfe a prince which had rested vpon his owne strength and power, euer at his pleasure to haue been raised, and as need should require supplied, without depending vpon his friends and allies, then haply it might haue bin in him accounted a great ouersight, to haue omitted and ouerslipped so faire an opportunitie. But the Hungarians being then not onely reuolted from him, but taking part with the Turks, and the Turks with them, and he of himselfe with his owne power not able to hold the field against them, or well to maintaine a defensiue warre; and his friends and allies, his M wonted and greatest staies, then at his greatest need failing of him also, what should he in such a case do but as he did? to accept of a reasonable peace whilest he might haue it; especially against such an enemie, as whose whole power being turned against him, might haue easily endangered his whole estate. For it is not reasonably to be thought, how the Emperour should

A of himselfe, without the great aid of the other Christian princes, his friends and allies, be able to withstand the huge and dreadfull power of the Othoman Emperour: as (without ominous presage be it spoken) it is to be feared it will too true appeare, whensoeuer his wars and troubles in the East being ended, he shall againe turne his forces this way toward the West.

Now Botscay was no sooner dead, but that some others of the nobilitie both of HVNGARIE and TRANSYLVANIA (haply no lesse ambitious then was hee) began by diuers meanes to seeke after and to aspire to that principalitie. Ofwhom, though some either with the weakenesse of their owne meanes or with the threates of Matthias the Archduke deterred, ceased farther to seeke after it: yet were there some others, who better supported, & nothing 1607
B afraid of the Archdukes great words, laboured vnder hand to haue obtained it. For the crossing of whom, and the auoyding of farther troubles to be raised by these ambitious competitors, certaine of the nobilitie of TRANSYLVANIA gathered together at CLAVDIOPLE the 12 of Februarie, made choyce of Sigismund Ragotsie for their gouernour and their prince of TRANSYLVANIA, and the more to assure him of their loue and affection towards him, bound themselues vnto him by the oath of their allegiance solemnely taken in the chiefe Church there. And afterward sent messengers to the Archduke Matthias at VIENNA, to certifie him what they had done, and to excuse themselues thereof: who comming to PRESBVRG the 12 of March, there openly protested this election of Ragotsie for their prince to haue been made, not for that they were about to rebell, or to reuolt from the Emperour, whom they would alwaies acknowledge for their soueraigne lord; but for that their necessity so required,
C many of the nobilitie both of TRANSYLVANIA and of HVNGARIE gaping after this Principalitie, and going about, for the obtaining thereof, to raise new stirres and troubles. Howbeit, the same Ragotsie afterward doubting not to be able, without great trouble and danger, besides the Emperours displeasure, to hold the same Principalitie, of his own accord about a yeare after gaue the same vp againe, and got himselfe out of the way to SARENTVM: who was no sooner gone, but that Gabriel Bathor was about to haue stept into his place: vnto whom the States of TRANSYLVANIA sent word by two of the noblemen, That the free election of the Prince belonged to them, and that therefore he should not seeke by force to intrude himselfe into the Principality, but quietly to come vnto the election, and not to bring with him aboue 1000 horsemen, and 500 foot.

Sigismund Ragotsie chosen Prince of Transyluania, afterward yeeldeth vp the same principalitie againe.

D About this time the strong towne of NEVHVSE (otherwise called NEVHEVSEL) the last yere so hardly wonne by the Hungarian rebels, was againe deliuered to Sigefrid Collonitz for the Emperor; who shortly after comming to VIENNA, brought newes of a great number of the Turks to haue risen vp in rebellion at BELORADE, to haue rifled the towne, and to haue burnt another towne, called ALISCHRIA, downe to the ground, and so with a great prey to be gone ouer to the rebels: And also Redeius, Botscay his Lieutenant, in going to take possession of certaine lands giuen him by Botscay, to haue bene by his owne tenants, lying in wait for him vpon a strait passage, slaine.

Amongst the articles of the peace before concluded betwixt the Emperour and the Great Sultan, one was for the mutuall sending of presents one of them vnto another: With which
E presents, when as the embassadour, by the Emperour appointed for the carriage of the same to CONSTANTINOPLE, from day to day deferred to set forward, the Turkes and Tartars began to doubt, or else seemed to doubt, of the good meaning of the Christians, for the obseruing of the aforesaid peace; and thereupon began againe not onely to rome abroad into the territories of the Christians, but also caused the pledges left at BVDA for the obseruing of the peace to be hardly handled & clapt fast in prison: whom when as the Bassa of BVDA shortly after suffered againe a little to walke abroad, the proud Ianizaries were therewith so much offended, that rising in a tumult, they had almost slaine the Bassa with stones, heaping vp-on him many reproachfull words, and vnto his face calling him traytor and betrayer of his prince and countrey; one of which pledges they grieuously wounded also. Which their in-
F solencie the Bassa in some sort to chastice, and to deterre them from doing the like againe, caused certaine of them the night following to bee secretlie taken, and beeing bound to bee so cast into the riuer of Danubius. And yet shortly after they purposing to make a road vpon the Christians, to colour such harmes as they should therein doe, and to lay all the blame blame thereof vpon the Christians, and to excuse themselues, they procured the Bassa to write vnto the Archduke Matthias, of great wrongs done vnto the Turkes by the Christians, when as there was no such thing at all: the effect of which letters were, That whereas it was in the articles of peace set downe and agreed, that both parties should abstaine from roades and incursions of each others countries, yet that the Christians for al that had aboue an hundred times since the conclusion of the peace made roads into diuers territories of the Turks, and slaine many of them: but especially they of LEOVEN and SETSCHIN, who (as they said) had slaine diuers Turkish marchants of PESTH, and taken from them great sums of money, as they had also taken from them of POTSEN a hundred and twenty horses, with diuers other cattell. Besides that, there were (as he said) foure Turks more by the Christians slaine, neere vnto CANISIA, and eight and twenty more taken prisoners: and that in the midway betwixt HATVVAN and BVDA fiue and twenty Turkes moe were slaine, and their horses, with all that they had beside, carried away. Which things for that they tended to the breach of the peace, he could not (as he said) but aduertise his Highnesse of, for that he thought the Christian captaines vpon the borders of their territories to be men that hated peace, and to seeke by their excursions, as heretofore they had done, so now likewise also, to disturb this good work begun, and by all means to encrease their owne priuat profit. And that therefore seeing that he and the Turks on their part wished not to attempt or go about any thing contrarie to the articles of the peace, that so likewise the Christians should containe themselues within their owne bounds, and with all speed by letters to giue him to vnderstand, whether they would keepe the peace, or not.

The effect of the letters of the Bassa of Buda to the Archduke Matthias.

The great Sultan (as is aforesaid) hauing made peace with the Christian Emperour, and now purposing to turne all his forces against his rebels in ASIA, and the Persian king (as wee haue oftentimes said) and desirous first to appease those his troubles at home, before he had further to doe with the Persian, he sent a messenger vnto the Bassa of ALEPPO, to lay downe armes, and to deliuer ouer his charge vnto another, to whom he had appointed the same; promising, that if he would shew himselfe obedient vnto this his commaund, he would not only pardon him all that was past, but receiue him into his grace and fauour also. Whereunto the Bassa answered, That he had neuer taken vp armes against his Majestie, but to be reuenged of the Bassaes of TRIPOLIS and DAMASCO, his sworn enemies; who once taken out of the way, he would not onely yeeld himselfe vnto his Majestie, but redeliuer also the tribute sent him from CAIRE and ALEXANDRIA, by him before intercepted, and (if hee so pleased to employ him) to bring great forces in his seruice against the Persian king. With which answere the Sultan not contented, shortly after sent the Visier Bassa with a great armie against the rebels into ASIA: who by his wisedome & discretion more then by force of armes hauing appeased the rebels in the lesser ASIA, and receiued certaine of the chiefest of them into his fauor, with an army of an hundred & thirty thousand men marched directly towards ALEPPO in SIRIA. Of whose comming the Bassa of ALEPPO hauing intelligence, with an armie of fortie thousand men, most part of them harquebusiers, went against him, & in a place of aduantage, not past two myles from the citie, there encountred him, and in three notable battailes one after another, withstood his whole forces. But making himselfe ready to haue encountred him the fourth time, vnderstanding of great aid comming to the Visier, from the Bassaes of DAMASCO and TRIPOLIS, he with speed retired, and returning into the citie, and hauing trussed vp his treasure, with such things as he made most reckoning of, fled into the mountaines towards PERSIA, with the greatest part of his armie yet left still following him. After which vnfortunate battell, the Visier Bassa with his armie comming vnto the city, at length by force tooke the same, and there to the terror of the inhabitants put to the sword all the garrison souldiors which the Bassa had there left.

The rebels in the lesser Asia by the Visier Bassa appeased.

But the Bassa purposing with new forces to haue encountred with the Visier, finding himselfe, together with his better fortune, forsaken by many of his former friends and companions, thought it best at length to take his refuge vnto the mercy of the great Sultan: and so resolued, by letters requested the Visier Bassa to write in his behalfe vnto the Sultan, and so, if it were possible, to procure his peace. Which the Visier hauing easily obtained, he was by letters from the great Sultan sent for to CONSTANTINOPLE, with assured promise, that hee should

A ſhould be employed in ſeruice againſt the Perſian king. Vpon receit of which letters, the Baſſa with an hundred horſe ſet forward, and comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, therein the preſence of many other of the Baſſaes humbled himſelfe vnto the Sultan; who not only kept his promiſe with him in pardoning of him, but alſo, in regard of the auncient familie whereof he was deſcended, as alſo of his great valour and faire conditions, receiued him againe into his fauour, and cauſed all the goods taken from him in SYRIA, to be againe vnto him reſtored.

The great ſultan ſeeketh in vaine by the meanes of the Tartar to make peace with the Perſian.

Now in the meane time the great Sultan had by the meanes of the great Cham of TARTARIE ſought to make peace with the Perſian king; but all in vaine: for that hee demaunded the Citie of TAVRIS, with all the prouinces before taken from him by the Perſians, to be
B againe vnto him reſtored: which the Perſian king vtterly denied, for as much as he had now by force of armes recouered the ſame, and which in former time belonged vnto his aunceſtors. At which time the ſayd Perſian king, the more to entangle the Turke, writ vnto the king of Spaine, for the turning of his forces alſo againſt the Turke their common enemie, the letters being to this effect: That though they were in religion diuided, yet that in power and in common hatred againſt the Othoman Empire they were conjoyned: and that hee, conſidering the greatneſſe of his power and armes; whereby he was become his neighbour in the Eaſt, hee could not but moſt entirely loue and fauour him: and that therefore he had commanded all his prouinces, as well in INDIA as in other places thereabouts, that they ſhould ſhew vnto his ſubjects all manner of courteſie, and to demaund of them no tribute.

C And that hee hauing by force recouered the fortreſſe of ADEN, which Solyman the Turkiſh Sultan had ſometime by treaſon ſurprized, he had appointed the ſame vnto the ſeruice of the Spaniſh Gouernour dwelling in GOA. And that his pleaſure was, that all the Chriſtians dwelling in his kingdom ſhould enioy the ſame libertie and priuiledges which his owne faithfull ſubiects had. And beſides declared, that hee had now for ſeuen yeares ſpace made continuall warres againſt the Turkiſh Sultan, who by treaſon had taken from him the ſtrong towne of CHIAMON, for the recouerie whereof hee had now diuers times ouerthrowne his armies. But for as much as he was determined to make no end of this warre, vntill he had driuen the Sultan out of thoſe parts of the Eaſt, and recouered the ſeat of Iſmael, and Iuchell, his auncеſtors in BABYLON and CAIRE, hee therefore requeſted him, being a king of D ſo great power, to ioyne in league with him, and to ſend his dreadfull fleet into the Perſian gulfe, promiſing, that by ſuch meanes the Othoman power driuen out, he could eaſily make himſelfe Lord of SYRIA and of ÆGYPT. Laſt of all, hee reckoneth vp the preſents hee ſent him, to wit, the Images of Iſmael, Iuchell, and of Ionas, together with his owne, caſt in gold, and ſet with moſt rich precious ſtones and pearles; a Perſian writing table, garniſhed with faire precious ſtones, foure dogs by nature wonderfully ſpotted with red, yellow, and blew ſpots, two pieces of arras adorned with moſt precious ſtones and pearle, wherein the worthie acts of him that great Tamberlane were liuely to bee ſeene: foure hunters-hornes very ſmooth and richly garniſhed: twelue moſt gallant plumes of feathers of diuers colors: ſixe drinking glaſſes which could not be broken, and couch beds ſo cunningly made, as that they

The States of Hungary about to depart from Presburg, by the perſwaſion of the Archbiſhop, there ſtayed.

Now the Emperour, for the better appeaſing of all former troubles, and the preuenting of new, and the better aſſurance of the ſtate, had about the middeſt of Auguſt called an aſſembly of the States of HVNGARIE to PRESBVRG: whither they being come, and hauing long in vaine expected the comming of Matthias the Archduke, by the Emperour appointed to haue beene Preſident in that aſſembly, were in the beginning of September about to haue returned home, but that requeſted by the Archbiſhop to ſtay yet fifteene dayes longer, they were contented ſo to doe, but yet vpon condition, that if the Archduke then came not, they ſhould not be bound to ſtay any longer: For why, they by letters certified of the F attempts of the Tartars (who had requeſted to haue a place in the borders of HVNGARIE, appointed them to dwell in) were deſirous in any wiſe to haue that aſſembly of Parliament put off to a farther time, that ſo they might the better betime preuent and meet with ſuch the Tartars deſignes, whom they were loth to haue for their bad and troubleſome neighbours. And now the Turkes in the meane time, in hope that the peace betwixt them and the Christians would not long hold, were come to BVDA in such multitude, that the houses in the towne being not able to hold them, they were glad to set vp tents for them to lye in within the citie: for that the Bassa would not suffer them to set vp any tents abroad in the fields, lest the Christians should suspect them to be about the raising of an armie, and so to disturbe the the peace. The States of Hungarie depart from Presburg without any thing doing.

But the states of HVNGARIE hauing stayed full 15 daies, as the Archbishop had requested, and the Archduke not comming; made a solemne protestation before the Chapter of the Cathedrall church at PRESBVRG, that they departed from PRESBVRG, and so returned home not vpon any discontentment or contumacie, but for want of things necessarie, & other their vrgent occasions (hauing aboue 7 weeks expected the Archdukes comming, without whom nothing could be done) and yet that if it should please the Emperor by solemne summons at any time after to call another parliament, they would be readie vpon such summons giuen, to returne againe to PRESBVRG, & there to consult of all such things, as should be for the good and welfare of the Common-weale: so that nothing were propounded contrarie to the articles the yere before agree vpon at VIENNA, which they would haue in all points kept whole and inuiolate: so that if any man should go about or attempt any thing in disposing & ordering of the publike affaires contrarie to that agreement, they would not in any wise ratifie the same, although it were by the Emperor himselfe allowed: which their protestation they requested to haue registred, and sealed with the Chapters seale; and so not hauing done any thing at all for which they came, againe retnrned. The Haiduckes go about to raise new sturres in Hungarie.

After whose departure from PRESBVRG the Haiduckes (men vsed to liue by their swords, and not by their labour) of all others most discontented with this generall peace, began now to raise new stirs and tumults, and dayly to grow stronger and stronger, craving aid of the Turkes and Tartars, and not of the other Hungarians, their countrie men now againe returned to their wonted alleageance vnto the Christian Emperor: a number of which Haiducks flocking to BVDA, the Bassa there with some other of the Turks captaines and commanders, entred into consultation what to do with these so fit instruments for the trobling of the Christians, and the disturbing of the peace. To entertaine them he durst not, and to cast them off he was loath; but yet purposing to vse them & to set them a worke as occasion should serue, he to prepare an enterance thereunto, by letters threatned them of COMORA, that except they better kept the capitulations and articles of the late peace, they should shortly heare of new matters. But in the meane time letters were sent from the great Sultan to the Bassa of BVDA, with charge that although the Christians were reported to encrease their strength, he should yet keep himselfe within his bounds, & to attempt nothing against them, except they should proceed to manifest force: in which case he should not faile by all lawfull meanes to reuenge himselfe. Which the Sultans mind once made knowne, the Turkes againe departed from BVDA, most part of the great ordnance that they brought with them being caried backe againe to SIGETH. K

An assembly of the States of the vpper Hungary and the decrees by them there made.

But the states of HVNGARIE, being returned home from PRESBVG, and againe assembled the 14 day of October, by their generall consent, decreed that TOCKAY should againe be ioyned vnto their iurisdiction; and that the great ordnance throughout all the free cities, should be remooued and carried home vnto the places whereunto they before belonged: that the Vaiuod of TRANSYLVANIA should be admonished not to seperate TRANSILVANIA from HVNGARIE: that the Bassa of BVDA should be warned for to keepe his Turkes within their owne bounds: and that the nobilitie of HVNGARIE should betime be admonished with all their force to represse the Haiduckes, and all other their enemies. L

The Haiduckes conspire against the Germanes.

Howbeit the Haiducks proceeding in their insolent outrages more than before, tooke certaine forts, and with fire and sword spoiled many places of the countrie, causing the people to sweare to be friends to them and the Turks, and enemies vnto the Germans & Wallons; and demaunding of Humanoius the crowne, wherewith Botscay had sometime been rewarded from the grand Seigniour, had a purpose to haue crowned him, or some other for their king; who for all that by a messenger sent word vnto them, that he would not at their hands accept that dignitie, but faithfully continue in his alleageance toward the Emperour. But M

A when the States of the vpper HVNGARIE were about to haue gone againſt theſe ſeditious and rebellious people to haue ſuppreſſed them; they were from ſo doing deterred by the Baſſa of AGRIA, threatning with his Turkes and Tartars to take their parts if they ſhould once take vp armes againſt them. The Turks further the inſolent attempts of the Haiducks.

About the ſame time ſix hundred Haiducks going to the caſtle of S. Andrew, and comming thither, could not be let in by the garriſon ſouldiors as they had deſired, and perceiuing them to make no reckoning of their ſeruice, could no longer hold, but openly profeſſed themſelues to become the Great Sultans ſeruants: who from thence marching to BVDNOC, tooke it by force, and ranſacked it: and ſo ſtill ſeeking after bootie, ran out towards TOCKAY;
B where by the way they were in a ſtrait by Humanoius, lying in wait for them, entrapped, and almoſt all ſlaine; who afterward ſent two of the Turks enſignes, taken from them to VIENNA, and to the terror of others empaled ſome of them vpon ſtakes, being brought priſoners to CASSOVIA. For which vnfortunat expedition, ſome other of the Haiducks lighting vpon two of the captaines, who by chance had eſcaped out of Humanoius his hands, put them both to death for the euill leading of their fellows, hanging vp the one, and with their ſwords hewing the other all to pieces. Now, by the report of ſome of the priſoners there taken it was knowne, this new rebellion of the Haiducks to haue beene raiſed by the procurement of the Baſſaes of BVDA and AGRIA, who by their meſſengers had promiſed vnto them all help. Which report to haue beene true, the euent did ſhortly after confirme: for the 27 day of
C Nouember almoſt 15000 of theſe Haiducks hauing before receiued from the Great Sultan 300000 duckats for pay, came and moſt ſtraitly beſieged FILEK, a ſtrong caſtle, the Turks ſending them great ordnance from AGRIA; vnto whom theſe Haiducks had promiſed to deliuer all ſuch places as they ſhould win. Howbeit, the euent of this ſiege anſwered not to their deſire: for Thomas Boſnias, captaine of FILEK, with his garriſon all of Germane ſouldiors ſo valiantly repulſed them, and the extremitie of the Winter weather ſo diſtreſſed them, that they were glad to rayſe their ſiege, and be gone. Six hundred Haiducks intercepted by Humanoius. The Haiducks in their rebellion ſupported by the Turks.

Now much about the ſame time viz. about the beginning of Nouember, a great fire aroſe at CONSTANTINOPLE, wherein almoſt 500 ſhops of wares with many other faire buildings were burnt, ſo that the harme there by fire done was eſteemed to amount to aboue two

At the ſame time that the aſſemblie of the States of HVNGARIE ſhould haue bin holden at PRESBVRG (as is before declared) the Emperour had appointed alſo another aſſembly of the nobilitie and States of AVSTRIA to be holden at VIENNA; where after they were aſſembled; certaine articles were vnto them on the Emperours behalfe propounded for them in that aſſembly then to conſider of: as firſt, that for the keeping of the frontiers of AVSTRIA in quiet, the contribution by them graunted among themſelues the laſt yeare; ſhould this yeare following be doubled. Then, that if it ſhould fortune the enemie to attempt any thing of new againſt that prouince, that in ſtead of the horſes and money which they were wont to ſend vnto the warres, they ſhould for the ſpace of twelue months, or of the greateſt part there-
E of, as occaſion ſhould require, of their own coſts maintaine ten companies of German footmen, euery companie being three hundred ſtrong, and as many troups of German horſmen, euery troope conſiſting of an 100 horſe. And, that if for the better defence of the borders of AVSTRIA there ſhould haply need a greater ſtrength, the ſame ſhould be raiſed in no other ſort than was vſed in HVNGARIE, nor at greater charges maintained. And, that if it ſhould continue peace, theſe charges ſhould be conuerted to the payment of the ſouldiours wages: and that the States & other ſubiects of that prouince ſhould ſo much as might be, be eaſed from the trouble of ſending either of horſe or foot for the defence of the frontiers. Thirdly, that Commiſſaries ſhould be maintained this yeare alſo to attend the armie, and certaine skilfull captaines appointed for the chooſing of a fit Generall for the armie. That diligent regard F and care ſhould be had for the prouiſion of corne and victuals for the vſe of the people in generall, as well in the time of peace as of warre. And that for as much as it much concerned the good of the Commonweale, to haue the frontiers of the countrey toward CANISIA diligently viewed, for feare of the Turkes great garriſon there ſtill lying, that therefore certaine good and expert ſouldiours, which knew thoſe places well, ſhould be An aſſembly of the States of Auſtria, and the Emperours demaunds therein.

choſen, who together with the deputies of the Emperour, Hungarians, and Stirians, riding about theſe confines, ſhould forthwith conſider what were beſt to be done for the ſaftie ther- G of. In briefe, ſeeing that of the ſafetie of RAB the welfare of the citie of VIENNA and of the forts thereabouts depended, that for the repairing of the fortifications thereof, and the better ſtrengthening of the ſame, the ſumme of 4000 florens ſhould be appointed: and for the defence of the frontiers of AVSTRIA from the incurſion of the Turkes garriſon of CANISIA, 5000: and for the furthering of the buildings at NVSTORFE, 5000 mo ſhould be paied: And that thoſe who hitherto had been ſlacke in paying of their contribution mony, ſhould forthwith be enforced to pay the ſame. And alſo that it might be conſidred of, how that too much inhauncing of the value of monies might be reſtrained: that good orders might be kept: all H
the countrie cleered from the robberies of the ſoldiors, ſtragling here and there vp & downe the ſame: that the counterfeit Hungarian and Polonian mony ſhould be prohibited, as not currant: that good order might be taken for the ſtaying of the plague, which then began in many places in AVSTRIA.

The aſſembly broken vp, and nothing concluded.

Concerning which articles, when as the States there aſſembled complained, all that countrie to be with the long wars againſt the Turke, the incurſions of the rebels, and the outrages of the muntious ſoldiors, alreadie almoſt exhauſted, and miſerably bared of mony; no reſolution could then, according as the neceſſitie required, be made, but was vnto a further time deferred, and the aſſemblie broken vp.

The Emperour at the ſame time appointed a Diet of the Empire to be holden at RATISBON: wherin he hauing appointed Ferdinand, Archduke of AVSTRIA, to be chiefe in his place, I he with a notable traine of ſeuen hundred horſe, and a gallant gard of footmen, came thither the eight and twentieth of Nouember, and was there by the citizens honourably receiued. Vnto which aſſemblie, when as the Deputies of the Electors, and of the other princes and cities of the Empire, were in great number come, at length the twelfth of Ianuarie diuine ſeruice being done in the Cathedrall Church, Ferdinand the Archduke, with his courtiers, the Emperours counſellors, and other the princes deputies being there preſent, taking horſe before the church, with a great companie of the nobilitie & princes deputies following of him, went to the Court, the citizens in their armes ſtanding on both ſides: where Godfrey Ortelius the Emperors Secretarie hauing in a notable Oration ſet forth the Emperours loue and af- K fection towards the Electors, Princes, and States of the Empire, and why the Emperor himſelfe could not be preſent at this aſſemblie, as willingly he would haue bin, he propounded in his name fiue articles for them in this their aſſemblie to be eſpecially conſidered of. Firſt,

The articles by the Emperour propounded to be conſidered of in the Diet of the Empire at Ratisbone.

how the Empire might hereafter bee preſerued and defended againſt the violence of the Turks, and the dangerous rebellions by their procurement ſtirred vp in HVNGARIE, to the endangering of the whole Empire; eſpecially ſeeing that the Turks themſelues (with whom the peace was of late concluded) by their doings had heretofore more than ſufficiently declared what truſt or credit was to bee giuen vnto them: and ſeeing that it is moſt manifeſt, them therein to haue ſought for nothing elſe, than that hauing made or rather counterfeited a peace with the Chriſtians for a time, for the ſuppreſſing of the rebels, and the repreſſing of L
the inuaſions of the Perſians, they might after ſuch victorie againſt them obtayned, come better prouided, and ſtronger to ouercome the Chriſtians. Which was eaſie to bee ſeene: for that whileſt they were yet intreating of peace, they had taken STRIGONIVM, and hauing concluded peace, they ceaſed not as yet with their counſell and aid to helpe the rebels in their rebellious tumults: which was manifeſtly to be perceiued by the Haiduckes themſelus, who were not aſhamed openly to profeſſe themſelues to bee the Great Sultans ſeruants, to require cities and fortreſſes to be yeelded vnto the Sultan, and to conſpire againſt the very name of the Germanes. For the ſpeedie remedie of which miſchiefe, the Emperour had thought good, that conſideration of this point ſhould ſo be had, as that the Princes ſhould either conſent vnto a certaine ſtanding and perpetuall contribution, whereby a M ſufficient ſtrength might alwaies be readie, wherewith to withſtand the enemies attempts: or elſe that for certaine yeares twentie thouſand footmen and foure thouſand horſe might there bee ſtill in readineſſe, to be maintayned at the common charges of the Empire, which the Emperour (need ſo requiring) might vſe againſt the common enemie. Or that if this were

A were heauie or troubleſome vnto the States of the Empire, yet at leaſt they ſhould conſent yearely to contribute ſo much money as might ſuffice for the ſuſtayning of ſuch a power. Another point of this concluſion, was about the correcting and reforming of the adminiſtration of iuſtice in the Imperiall chamber. For ſeeing that in the former aſſemblies and meetings this matter could not be fully decided, by reaſon of certaine hindrances and impediments which then fell out, and that without the due adminiſtration and execution of iuſtice no Empire could long ſtand or flouriſh, no more than the world could without the Sunne, his Imperiall Maieſtie therefore would not haue the deliberation of this ſo neceſſarie a point to be put off or referred vnto any other aſſemblie, but to be done and concluded in
B this preſent aſſembly. The third point to be conſidered of, was the warre which hath been now ſo many yeares made in the Low Countries, and the inconueniencie thereof redounding vnto the Empire. For whereas in the treatie of peace in the Low Countries (at which treatie both hee and the whole Empire ought to haue beene there preſent) for the better concluding and ending of the ſame, hee had heard the confederate princes to be now acknowledged for a free State, hee could not now any longer (as hee ſaid) forbeare, but that (ſeeing the Low Countries to be a member and fee of the Empire, and that by the auncient records of the Empire, and of the Emperours, and by many other proofes it appeareth, the Gouernours of the Low Countries to haue beene vaſſales of the Empire) he ſhould by letters which were written vnto the king of SPAINE, the Archduke Albertus, and the States of C the confederate prouinces, admoniſh them, That they ſhould not proceed to doe or determine any thing in this matter, which might any way tend to the hurt or preiudice of the Emperour, of the Empire, and of the houſe of AVSTRIA. And for as much as that warre in the Low Countries had hitherto done no ſmall harme vnto the Empire, if happily it could not be agreed vpon betweene the parties, and that it ſhould happen the ſame warre to bee any longer continued, or rather againe renewed, it ſhould then be conſidered vpon, how the Empire might be ſatisfied for the great harme it had vntill this preſent thereby receiued, and how it might be from the like harme hereafter kept and preſerued. The fourth point in this conſultotion, which was to be conſidered of, concerned the coyne. For whereas it is manifeſt, that the value of the money to bee dayly more and more inhaunced and rayſed, and D that thereby not onely the Magiſtrates in the publicke receipt, but the ſubiects alſo in generall receiued great and manifeſt harme, for as much as the price of ſuch neceſſarie things which we muſt in this life haue ordinarie vſe of, muſt of neceſſitie bee ſtill more and more encreaſed, according to the value of the money, the Emperor thought good with mature deliberation to remedie this miſchiefe in this preſent aſſembly of the Empire. The fift and laſt point which was to be conſidered vpon, was the perfecting of the Matriculer of the Empire, for the giuing vnto euery man that which of due belongeth vnto him: the perfecting of which Matriculer, the Emperour would haue in this aſſemblie to be amongſt them conſidered of.

Which articles thus propounded, there fell a great controuerſie amongſt the deputies of E the princes concerning the manner of their proceeding in theſe matters: as whether they ſhould conſider of theſe articles in ſuch order as they were propounded, or otherwiſe. And when as many thought it beſt firſt to conſider of the article, for the reformation of iuſtice, being the ſecond article propounded to be conſidered of, and afterwards to come vnto the reſt of the articles to be afterward conſulted of: when as the two and twentieth day of Ianuarie they came againe to counſell, a writing was by the Emperours commaund read vnto them, whereby it was ſignified vnto the States of the Empire: the rebellious tumults by Botſcay and ſome others rayſed in HVNGARIE to bee yet by the Haiduckes continued, the Sultan himſelfe ſending of them rewards, and furniſhing them with ordnance and other things neceſſarie for the warres by the Gouernour of AGRIA, and the Baſſa of BVDA threat-
F ning all extremities vnto them which ſhould go about to reſiſt them; & then augmenting the danger which thereby might enſue vnto the empire, and eſpecially vnto the Cermane name, ſeeing that it was manifeſt thoſe rebellious Haiducks, to haue eſpecially conſpired the diſtruction of the Germanes, and to haue confirmed that their league, by drinking of an health: It was requeſted, that leauing of theſe contentions, for the manner of their proceeding, they would turne their conſultations vnto the firſt article, and reſolue how remedie might in time be giuen vnto this miſchiefe, and how aid might be ſent vnto the Emperour againſt his enemies. G

The Deputies for the ſtates of the Empire, in the aſſemblie at Ratisbone, at variance among themſelues.

But when as in their often meetings, nothing could be concluded, by reaſon of the diuers and different opinions betwixt the Proteſtants and Catholickes, Ferdinand the Archduke againe calling togither the Deputies of the Electors, of the Princes, and of the Imperiall cities, cauſed it by letters to be declared vnto them, how that the Emperour not without his great griefe and ſorrow had heard, that for certaine diſſention among them they could not yet come to conſult of the articles propounded, in that aſſemblie to be by them conſidered of, but to his great griefe to be from day to day protracted: and that therefore he requeſted them, That either they themſelues would quietly end thoſe diſſentions among themſelues, or elſe ſend their differences conceiued in writing vnto the Emperour to be decided, and ſo at length to come effectually to conſult of the propounded articles. And indeed the Deputies aforeſaid had in writing before exhibited their minds concerning that point, for the manner of their proceeding, vnto the Archduke Ferdinand. But for as much as that writing was according to the manner of the Catholickes and the Proteſtants, of two different ſorts; the former thinking it meet to conſult of the aforeſaid articles in ſuch order as they were propounded, and firſt of all, to conſider of the contribution to be giuen againſt the Turks, and other enemies in HVNGARIE; but the other labouring firſt for the reformation of iuſtice, and the confirming of the peace of Religion, and afterward to prouide for aid againſt the forraine enemies, that ſo remedie might firſt bee prouided for inward, then for outward griefes; eſpecially ſeeing that they had no expreſſe commaundment firſt to determine of the contribution. Vnto whom the Archduke by writing againe anſwered, That he had receiued no other inſtruction from the Emperour, than that hee ſhould conſult of the aforeſaid articles, with the Deputies there preſent, in ſuch order as they were propounded: neither that it was conuenient, that the firſt article concerning contribution being neglected, they ſhould proceed vnto the ſecond, ſeeing that the enemies might eaſily, by the delay of putting of the ſame in effect, take occaſion in the meane time to doe the Chriſtians great harme. Beſides that, that hee had ſufficiently proteſted, That conſultation concerning the reformation of iuſtice ſhould in this preſent aſſemblie bee had alſo; neither that it was the Emperours mind to haue it deferred vnto any other aſſemblie. Wherefore he exhorted the Proteſtants, That they ſhould forthwith endeauour by their letters vnto the Electors and Princes, and other their ſuperiours, to obtaine leaue, that they might firſt determine ſome certaintie about the firſt article concerning contribution, that ſo giuing way to the opinion of the other partie, they might inſtantly prepare themſelues for the making of the contribution. Howbeit, this his perſuaſion preuayled nothing, by reaſon of their diſcord and diſſention about the order of their conſultation; the one part ſtill labouring for the contribution to be firſt agreed vpon, and the other part holding as hard for the reformation of iuſtice: So that Ferdinand the Archduke out of hope of concluding any thing that good was, not in vaine to ſpend his coſt and time any longer, the fift of May diſmiſſed the aſſemblie, and returned home, as did all the reſt of the Electors and Princes Deputies, no one article that was propounded being ſo much as once reaſoned of, but all left vndecided: ſo ſmall care was there of the common good, either for the raiſing of money for the withſtanding of the Turkes and rebels, or for the reformation of iuſtice; the neceſſitie of both, either on the one ſide or the other, ſo hardly vrged, and yet in concluſion bee neither reſpected or regarded. The Diet of the ſtates of the empire at Ratisbone broken off, and nothing concluded.

Matthias the Archduke commeth to Preſburg.

Whileſt the Diet to no purpoſe (as is aforeſaid) was by the Archduke Ferdinand holden at RATISBON, Matthias the Archduke with a great traine following of him, came in the meane time to PRESBVRG, where he was with much ioy and triumph receiued, the garriſon ſouldiors in order ſtanding on both ſides the way as he went vnto the caſtle: Napragius the biſhop of RAB, with an eloquent oration welcomming of him, in the preſence of certaine of the Hungarian nobilitie, who had gone out as far as HAINBVRG to meet him, and now alſo honourably welcommed him, much reioicing at his comming. The next day the Archbiſhop and Cardinal of STRIGONIVM with a notable traine of Hungarian gentlemen came to PRES- M

A BVRG, who foorthwith receiued into the caſtle, and hauing ſaluted the Archduke, conferred with him of many things in this aſſembly to be conſulted of. In the meane time Illiſhaſchius that noble Hungarian (of whom we haue ſo often ſpoken) arriued there alſo with twelue coaches, ninetie harquebuſiers, and forty Hungarian horſemen going before him, and three hundred Haiduckes which had attended vpon him, being at the gate diſmiſſed. So the chiefe of the Hungarian States being come, the conſultation was begun the three and twentieth day of Ianuarie: where when as the Archduke had propounded vnto the Hungarian nobilitie, what things they were eſpecially to conſider of; it was by them anſwered, The Haiduckes before their comming out to haue determined, not one whit to depart from the articles the yere
B before propounded and agreed of at VIENNA, nor to admit any limitation at all of them: ſo that for the appeaſing of the tumults of the Haiduckes, there was no need of any new conſultation, but onely to confirme ſuch things as was then and there conſulted and agreed vpon. From which their reſolution, when as the Hungarians were not to be remoued, and being grieued with the ſcoffing at of certaine of the Clergie (thereupon refuſed in any wiſe to make their appearance, as they were commaunded, before the Cardinall in the caſtle) were about againe to depart, making a ſolemne proteſtation themſelues to bee guiltleſſe of ſuch harmes as ſhould therof afterwards enſue: it was at length on all parts agreed vpon, That the whole matter ſhould be committed vnto ten choſen out of the Hungarian counſellours, and ten moe of the counſellors of AVSTRIA, to be conſulted and determined of. By whom, being
C met all together the eight and twentieth day of Ianuarie, in the houſe of Illiſhaſchius; it was concluded, That ſeeing that peace and quietneſſe in thoſe countries of HVNGARIA and AVSTRIA could not otherwiſe be made, that thoſe articles and conditions, concerning which no agreement could the yeare before be made in the treatie at VIENNA, being quite left off and neglected, the reſt of the articles which were there agreed vpon, ſhould bee ſtill intirely obſerued and kept: and that it ſhould be lawfull for euerie man to haue the free exerciſe of his religion. Which thing the Commiſſioners of AVSTRIA by a ſpeciall writing there confirmed vnto the Hungarians: Whereby they declared themſelues after long and mature deliberation, to haue perceiued not only by the true relation and report of the Hungarians, but alſo by their owne experience, vnto how great inconueniences the whole kingdom of HVN-
D GARIE hath of long time beene expoſed, as well for the warres it hath had with the common enemie of the Chriſtians, as for diuers the ciuile tumults and ſeditions therein; and that therfore they not willing that ſuch harme ſhould in thoſe countries againe increaſe and grow to the infinit effuſion of Chriſtian bloud, after the articles of pacification agreed vpon at VIENNA, ſaw no other better remedie for theſe ſo great inconueniences, than that all parties ſhould ſtill hold themſelues contented with the ſame articles of pacification, concluded and agreed vpon in the ſaid aſſembly at VIENNA. And that therefore they had decreed, thoſe articles to be ſincerely and inuiolately kept: and promiſed vnto the States of HVNGARIE, to giue their aid for the defence of theſe articles, againſt all their enemies, being readie to giue good reaſon thereof before God, the Church, the Emperour Radolph, the Archduke Matthias, and his other brethren, and all the houſe of AVSTRIA, as the neceſſitie of thoſe coun-
E tries ſhould ſeeme to require: hoping alſo, that the States of HVNGARIE would reſt themſelues likewiſe in that pacification of VIENNA, and the aſſurance thereof, in all points obſeruing the ſame: and that they would alwayes giue their readie helpe and aid vnto the countries of AVSTRIA, againſt their enemies in like manner. Which things thus agreed vpon, and determined, letters of confederation were in the name of Matthias the Archduke, and of all as well the Eccleſiaſticall as Temporall States of HVNGARIE and AVSTRIA, to this purpoſe written, That whereas for the appeaſing and ſuppreſſing of the tumults and ſeditions which the Haiduckes, by the inſtigation of the Turks, had of late not doubted to raiſe, for the concluding of peace with the great Sultan, they were met together at PRESBVRG, & therin alto-
F gether buſied, to deuiſe how the kingdome of HVNGARIE, with the countries adioyning, might from deſtruction bee deliuered, in the Chriſtian religion preſerued, and from waſting and ſpoyling, whereunto they had hitherto been expoſed, ſaued: vpon mature deliberation had as well in the name of them that were preſent, as of them that were abſent, made ſuch a confederation and league: That if hereafter it ſhould fortune any detriment or warre to be by any man made or done vnto the Hungarians, or the countries thereabout, for the a- G foreſaid articles of pacification, which they had determined religiouſly to keepe, that they would forthwith, with their vnited forces, come to aid their confederate brethren, and together with them to liue or die.

With theſe letters ſigned and ſealed with the hand of the Archduke, and of the noble men there preſent, the firſt of Februarie, Illiſhaſchius with George Turſon, were ſent vnto the tumultuous Haiduckes (who had now appointed their meſſengers to bee ſent vnto the Sultan, and the Tartar Cham, to craue their aid) to diſſuade them from ſuch their purpoſe, and to perſuade them to quietneſſe; threatning them withall, That if they would not hearken vnto ſuch honeſt conditions, they ſhould altogether, and at once, bee ſet vpon and oppreſſed, by the H whole power of the States.

The States of Enſeric cõmanded by the Archduke Matthias to be alwaies in a readineſſe againſt the Haiduckes.

The aſſembly at PRESBVRG thus ended, Matthias the Archduke returning to VIENNA, and forthwith calling together the States of ENSERIC, declared vnto them all that was done in the aſſembly at PRESBVRG. And for as much as that aſſembly was chiefly to that end appointed, That the kingdome of HVNGARIE ſhould not altogether bee pluckt away from the empire; and that after the reuolt therof, the greateſt harmes to be done by the incurſions and ſpoiling of the enemies, would lie vpon the countries of AVSTRIA, he aduiſed them ſo to looke vnto themſelues, and carefully to prouide for the Commonweale, as that hauing money alwayes in readineſſe to maintaine an armie, they might with all conuenient ſpeed goe to meet with the Haiduckes, if haply they would not conforme themſelues vnto the articles of paci- I fication, but againe raiſe new broiles; that ſo they might defend and preſerue their countrey from their outrages.

The prince of Valachia dieth, whoſe widow notably preſerueth the country for her ſonne.

About the beginning of this Spring, when as Ierome prince of VALACHIA was dead, leauing behind him a ſonne but thirteene yeares old, the Emperour admitted him, as yet not capable of the gouernment, vnder Tutors, vnto the ſucceſſion of his heritage. Which thing the Valachians being by no meanes willing to endure, and bearing themſelues vpon the helpe of the Turks, went about to make choice of another in ſtead of their prince of late dead. For which cauſe the princes widow by letters certified Polloſcie her ſonne in law, of this outrage and iniury of her ſubiects: and hauing obtained of him a great ſumme of money, and therewith raiſed an armie of ten thouſand good ſouldiors went forth againſt the Valachians, and K in open field ouercame them in ſo bloudy and terrible a battell, that hauing ſlaine fiue thouſand of the Valachians and Turks, ſhe had ouer them a notable victorie, and by that meanes preſerued the principalitie of that countrey for her ſonne.

The duke of Florence in vaine requeſted by the Turkes to ſpare their gallies.

The great Duke of FLORENCE had hitherto done great harme with his fleete vnto the Turkes in the Mediterranean ſea: for which cauſe a meſſenger about this time comming vnto him in the great Sultans name, promiſed him great matters, ſo that he would from thenceforth forbeare to hurt and purſue the Turkes gallies. Which his requeſt ſerued the Turks to no other vſe, but as it were to put oile vnto the fire. For the Duke afterward cauſed new gallies to be made, and his fleet increaſed, and therewith did more harme than formerly hee had done. L

The Haidukes refuſe to admit of the pacification made at Vienna.

Now although that after the ending of the aſſembly at PRESBVRG, Illiſhaſchius and George Turſon, had deliuered vnto the Haiduckes the articles of the pacification, and commaunded them from thencefoorth to keepe themſelues quiet, yet for all that could they not yet bee perſwaded to hearken vnto ſuch their counſell: for that they being men ſtill accuſtomed to the warres, and liuing by their ſwords, could not endure to fall to huſbandrie, and ſuch other labours. For which cauſe they of the Countrey about GYMERIC writ vnto them which dwelt in the Countrey about NVSOLL, letters to this effect: That for as much as they beeing diuers times certified of the miſerable eſtate of their neighbours, had refuſed to come to ayd them, they ſhould yet now remember how neceſſarie a thing it were, with their conioyned mindes and forces to helpe one another; for that the M Haiduckes hauing now paſſed the riuer of Teiſe, were broken into that prouince, and were runne as farre as BVDNOC: neither were they minded ſo to ſtay, but to robbe and ſpoyle all the countrey before them, if they were not with ſpeed encountred. And the rather, for that but a few daies before they had receiued thirtie thouſand Hungarian Duckats from

A from the Turkes, whom they now acknowledged for their lords, with horſes and other gifts to be diuided among their leaders and captaines: and moreouer, daily expected aid from the Tartars, who in great number lay about BELGRADE. Wherefore ſeeing that it could not be expreſſed, what great harme and loſſe was by the Haiducks done as well vnto the noblemen themſelues, as to the common countrey men; that they ſhould therefore thereof giue their neighbours to vnderſtand, and with all ſpeed to take vp armes againſt the ſame rebellious Haiduckes.

Not long after, about the latter end of March, proclamation was made by the commaundement of Matthias the Archduke, throughout all AVSTRIA, that euery man ſhould prouide himſelfe to take vp armes: the cauſe whereof men diuerſly ſuſpected: howbeit that vn-
B to this proclamation was this reaſon ioyned, That the Archduke was determined himſelfe to goe about the fourteenth of April into MORAVIA, and there to gather together all his power, as well Hungarians as Auſtrians and Haiduckes, for the warre hee was to take in hand. There were alſo letters in the Archdukes name ſent vnto the vaſſals of AVSTRIA, to giue them to vnderſtand, That whereas they were not ignorant, what, for the obtaining of peace, and defence of theſe countries, had of late been decreed at PRESBVRG, and that all the States of ENSBRIC had approued the report thereof receiued from their deputies; and ſo promiſed their helpe and aid vnto the Archduke, as if that he himſelfe would take in hand any expedition, they would joyne themſelues vnto him, and together with him to liue or die: yet that there were ſome which being more deſirous of warre than peace, did not onely not reſt vpon
C the former pacification, but gathered an armie alſo in the borders of MORAVIA, with a purpoſe to make an inroad as well into MORAVIA, as into AVSTRIA it ſelfe. For which cauſe the States of MORAVIA alſo were enforced, for defence of themſelues, to raiſe an armie, and to craue helpe from their neighbours. And that therefore ſeeing the Archduke mindfull of his promiſe for the common defence of the countrey, was reſolued to beſtow his life, and all his fortunes, and in his owne perſon to vndertake an expedition vnto thoſe places from whence the greateſt daunger was to bee feared to fall vpon thoſe countreys, neceſſitie then required, that the States themſelues alſo ſhould ſuffer nothing to bee wanting on their behalfe, but e-D uerie one of them together with their ſeruants to ioyne themſelues vnto the Archduke, and to the vttermoſt of their power to indeuor themſelues to deliuer them and theirs from death and deſtruction. That God, in whoſe name this expedition was by them to be taken in hand, as by the louers of peace, might ſo in ſhort time make an end of all tumults; and grant vnto thoſe countries wiſhed peace and quietneſſe. And that therefore they were to be admoniſhed, that according to the tenour of the decree made at PRESBVRG, they with ſuch a number of horſe and foot as they could vpon the ſudden raiſe at a day to bee ſhortly after vnto them named, ſhould ioyne themſelues vnto the Archduke, and not to ſuffer any thing to let them in ſo doing. So that if haply any chance or ſickneſſe ſhould happen vnto their Generall, yet notwithſtanding that they ſhould ſend their power vnder the leading of ſome other man, ſeeing that the Archduke himſelfe ſpared not to aduenture his life and fortunes, and (if God E ſhould ſee it ſo good) account it a great gaine euen to loſe the ſame, ſo that thereby he might doe his countrey good.

The States of Auſtria warned by the Archduke to prepare themſelues for an expedition to be made into Moravia.

About the beginning of Aprill the Cardinall returning from PRAGE to VIENNA, brought with him the Emperors anſwer and reſolution, viz. That he did ratifie & confirme all things that were done and concluded with the Hungarians and Turks, but that his will was that the confederation made betwixt the States of HVNGARIE and AVSTRIA, at PRESBVRG, ſhould bee void and of none effect. Which the Archduke proteſting, that he could by no meanes like of, or ſuffer to be done, he the fifteenth of Aprill afterwards with a great number of the Peeres, Nobilitie, and Counſellors, and a multitude of good ſouldiors, going out of VIENNA towards the monaſterie of NEOBVRG, ſet forward vpon his iourny, carying with him eight and twentie peeces of ordnance, there expecting his ſouldiors in all places leuied: by publike letters
F proteſting, That no man ſhould from his armie receiue any harme; or if that by chance any harme were done vnto any man by his armie, aſſuring his ſubiects it ſhould bee againe vnto them reſtored and recompenſed.

The Archduke Mathias preparath himſelfe for his expedition into Moravia.

But the rumor of this expedition being brought into BOHEMIA, the Nobilitie of the countrey began to aſſemble themſelues the fifteenth day of Aprill; whither when as many of the deputies deputies of the other countries were assembled also, it being decreed, That the Nobilitie of the faithfull States there present, should with all speed returne home, and so prouide themselues and their subiects of necessarie armes, that, need so requiring, they should therewith be able to defend themselues and their countrey, the assembly was dismissed. Besides that, the Emperour himselfe carefull for all euents, caused many both horse and foot, to be brought to PRAGE, and to be diuersly billited in the citizens houses: and furthermore, the eighteenth of Aprill, by letters directed vnto certaine princes of the empire, and to certaine earles also, citizens, and other vassales of the kingdome of BOHEMIA, warned them with all speed to send aid vnto him at PRAGE. G

But Matthias the Archduke in the meane time marching forward with an armie of twentie thousand horse and foot, the foure and twentieth day of Aprill came to ZNAIME, a citie of MORAVIA; and was there, by the States of MORAVIA (who the day before were come thither also with foure hnndred horse) honourably receiued and brought into the citie. From thence sending out letters into the territories of BOHEMIA, and to the citie of PRAGE, he requested, That they would send out of euerie place two deputies for them, vnto the assembly to be holden at ZASLAVIA, the fourth day of May: promising withall, That hee himselfe there being present, would yeeld vnto their deputies a reason of his doings, as also what hee meant to doe hereafter. Besides that, hee by letters sent vnto the electers and other princes of the empire, declared the cause why he was enforced to make this expedition: and withall sending vnto them a copie of the agreement made at VIENNA, the fiue and twentieth day of April, in the yeare 1606, by the common consent of the Archdukes, in most friendly maner requested them, That they would not intermedle in this businesse, but rather with their counsell and aid to further the same. H I

But the three and twentieth day of Aprill the Emperour sent the Popes embassadors, with the embassadours of diuers other princes and States, then lying at PRAGE with sundrie of the Bohemian ministers, in embassage to the Archduke Matthias, still lying at ZNAIME: whom the Cardinall the next day after followed also, to make some good pacification, if it were possible, with the Archduke. But the Emperour in the meane time calling vnto him the counsellors of the old and new towne of PRAGE (contrarie to his woonted manner) most courteously with his owne hand receiued them, and giuing them thanks for the faithfull dueties by them hitherto performed, requested them, That hereafter they would continue in their like fidelitie and loyaltie also: most liberally promising vnto them all kindnesse, with the restitution of the priuiledges concerning the shutting of the gates of the citie: which libertie they had before lost in the time of the Emperour Ferdinand. And not long after a generall muster was taken, not onely in the citie of PRAGE, and the townes thereabouts, but also throughout all the kingdome of BOHEMIA, and three hundred musketiers appointed for the gard and keeping of the castle, vnder the commaund of Count Solmes, who had commission for the raising of other souldiors also. K

The Tartar Cham dyeth.

At the verie same time it was from CONSTANTINOPLE certainely reported, the Tartar Cham to haue dyed, and the Turkish Sultan hauing receiued newes thereof, to haue dismissed his sonne, whom he hitherto had detained as a pledge, and with diuers ships and gallies, to haue caused him to bee transported ouer the Blacke sea, vnto the borders of TARTARIE, there to take possession of his fathers kingdome. It was also then reported, certaine of the seditious Turkes making of a road to haue surprized SMIRNA, a rich citie of ASIA, and to haue forraged all the countrey about it farre and neere, and comming vnto MAGNESIA, a chiefe citie of that countrey, to haue had ten thousand crownes by the inhabitants offered, from thenceforth to spare the countrey thereabouts. The Persian king also at the same time notably to proceed in his wars, and to doe the Turke great harme, the Turkes and Tartars seeking in vaine to withstand him. L

The seditious Turkes raise new strifes in the lesser Asia, and spoyle Smirna with the countrie thereabouts.

Embassadors sent from the Electors of Saxonie and of Brandenburg for the appeasing of the troubles betwixt the Emperour and Matthias.

In the meane time embassadours comming vnto PRAGE from the Electors of SAXONIE and BRANDENBVRG, part of them, the ninth of May, went vnto the Archduke Matthias to ZASLAVIA, who still lay there encamped with an armie of fiue and twentie thousand men: of whom they requesting a truce for the space of eight dayes, for the making of a pacification betwixt the Emperour and him, and for friendly ending of this businesse, easily obtained the same, especially seeing that those princes Electors, being ioyned and bound vnto the Emperour M

A rour in a double confederation as well for their Electorſhip, as in reſpect of the kingdom of Bohemia, could not, as they ſaid, otherwiſe do, but ſend preſent aid vnto the Emperor, his neceſſitie ſo requiring; to which end they had now in readineſſe certaine thouſands of ſouldiours in the frontiers of their countries, to be forthwith ſent vnto him: The other part of theſe embaſſadours in the meane time ſtaying with the Emperor, where after the Germane manet they were well prouided of good cheere and wine.

About the ſeuenteenth of May Matthias the Archduke with 18000 men riſe and marched towards Prage, Collonitz with the reſt of the armie following him. And although that the Archduke had ſeuerely commanded his ſouldiors to abſtaine from robbing, ſpoyling, and burning of the countrey, and had diuers times ſeuerely puniſhed ſome offenders therein, by B hanging of ſome, and heading of others, yet could he by no meanes ſo reſtraine them, and keep them in, but that ſome of them would ſometimes be ſtragling abroad, and doing harm, eſpecially the Hungarians, who were ſtill running out euen as farre as the Emperors campe, and the new citie of Prage. Whom for all that the Emperors ſouldiors being then twentie thouſand ſtrong, would not meddle withall, being ſo commanded by the Emperor. Howbeit ſome of theſe ſtraglers going too farre abroad into the countrey, were by the countrey men cut off and ſlaine.

Matthias the Archduke marcheth towards Prage.

The three and twentieth day of May an aſſembly of the States of Bohemia was called at Prage, the Emperour himſelfe being there preſent, Adam Waldſtein carrying the drawen ſword before him. In which aſſembly the Nobilitie and States of the countrey, with one C conſent promiſed to ſpend their goods and liues in the Emperors quarrell: yet in the meane time requeſting theſe things following to be granted and confirmed vnto them, viz. That religion, according to the confeſſion of Bohemia & Avgvsta, ſhould inuiolately be kept, and that they which profeſſed the one, ſhould not therefore ſcoffe, or deſpiſe the other. That Bohemians only ſhould be preferred to Arckbiſhopricks, Abbotſhips, and other ſpirituall preferments. That the Archbiſhop ſhould not meddle with ciuill and political affaires. That Eccleſiaſticall offices ſhould be permitted vnto the Proteſtant miniſters, as in former time, the Catholikes in the mean time holding that they had. That the pontificiall diſpenſation in cauſes of Matrimonie, according to the decree of the aſſembly holden in the yeare 1602, ſhould be abrogated & taken away. That it ſhould not be lawfull for prieſts, and other Eccleſiaſtical D perſons, to buy lands or territories, without the expreſſe conſent of all the three States, but to hold themſelues contented with their tithes, and other their reuenues. That it ſhold be lawful for all men, in their own ground and territories, to build churches for religion, on both ſides. That Proteſtants and patrons of the Vniuerſitie of Prage, ſhould be ioyned to the conſiſtorie, as they were in the time of the Emperor Ferdinand. That one ſhould be choſen for Burgraue in this aſſembly. That chiefe politicall offices ſhould not be left void aboue a moneth. That vnto theſe political offices men of both religions ſhould be admitted: ſo that if the Burgraue were a Catholike, the chiefe judge ſhold be a Proteſtant. That euery man ſhould enioy his right, and that no decree ſhould bee publiſhed againſt the ſame: neither that they which were of the order of Knights ſhold be raſhly ſued, or bound to any areſt. That one of the Bo- E hemians ſhould alwaies be choſen in, to the ſecret counſell, & made acquainted with the Bohemian affaires. That euery man might haue acceſſe to the Emperor, and not all things to be done by his counſellors. That it ſhould be declared to all men, what was to be vnderſtood by the crime of treaſon. That a difference ſhould be made betwixt offences: and that no man ſhould for any light offence, together with his goods loſe his life & reputation. That the ſuits of widowes, orphans, and others alſo, ſhould with expedition be diſpatched, & not from day to day deferred. That from henceforth the father ſhould not be bound to pay the ſons debt, which he was run into without his knowledge; neither yet the ſon himſelfe. That in politicall offices men ſhould not be too much grieued with too heauy exactions. That men ſued ſhould not be ſummoned but in good tearms, and that ſuch as were in any reputation be bound vn- F to any areſt, without the hearing of their cauſe, & much leſſe be impriſoned. That the ſword vpon frowardnes or madneſſe taken out of the church of Thine, certain yeres before, ſhould be againe ſet in the former place. That Lawyers which pleaded mens cauſes, ſhould be contented with ſuch fees as were by common decrees apointed them. And laſt of all to conclude they

they in any wise requested the Emperour that it would please him to ease the Nobilitie and G States of BOHEMIA of these griefes, before they were compelled to answer vnto such things as were to be propounded vnto them on his behalfe. Who easily granted vnto most of these articles, those which concerned Religion onely excepted; so that the Senatours of the olde towne of PRAGE obtained the desired sword to bee againe forthwith set in the wonted place. But as for the businesse of Religion it was altogether put off and deferred vnto the next assembly to be holden at the feast of Saint Michaell.

Matthias the Archdukes Embassadors come to Prage.

About the end of May the Archduke Matthias his Embassadors hauing receiued safe conduct from the Emperour and the nobilitie of the kingdome of BOHEMIA, came to PRAGE: and being admitted into the councell of the Nobilitie, Charles count Tseratin to whom that charge was giuen, hauing in the Archdukes name first saluted the Nobilitie, caused what he H and the rest had in charge to be before them out of a long writing in the Bohemian tongue read: which done, when as, the nobility so requiring, they were put aside, & almost an houre after were called againe, they receiued answere, That the points of the Embassage by them propounded were greater and of more weight than that sufficient deliberation could thereof in so short a time be had; and that therefore it was by the nobilitie thought meet that Commissioners on both sides meeting together in the open field neere vnto DEBRITSE should there consult of these articles, and by the consent of the Emperour and Archduke to do what they might to end the matter: Vnto which answer the Archdukes Embassadours consenting, the ninth of Iune returned againe vnto the campe. The Emperors Embassadors within two daies after with fortie coaches and an hundred horse following them vnto the place I appointed: who oftentimes going to and fro, at length so wrought the matter on both sides, that the businesse quietly and friendly ended they were againe made friends.

Commissioners appointed for the ending of the troubles betwixt the Emperour and Matthias the Archduke.

The articles of which pacification & agreement betwixt the Emperor and the Archduke were the seuenteenth day of Iune in the castle of PRAGE openly read in the Bohemian tongue Lichtenstein, Kintskie, and other chiefetaines the Archdukes Embassadours, being there also present, in order thus:

The articles of pacification betwixt the Emperour and the Archduke Matthias.

That the Emperour refused not but that the Crowne of HVNGARIE should be deliuered into the Archduke Matthias his hands: and to yeeld vnto him the kingdome of HVNGARIE, and to remit vnto his subjects the oath of their allegiance before giuen vnto him, so that the Nobilitie and States of HVNGARIE should choose no other King but the Archduke. K
That in the next Diet of the Empire hee should propound vnto the States of the Empire to be considered of, what contribution they ought to make vnto the Archduke for the defence of the frontiers, if happily longer warre were to be made with the Turke. That hee should cause the writings which concerned that kingdome of HVNGARIE within the space of two moneths to be deliuered vnto the Archduke. That he should likewise also surrender vp the Archdukedome of AVSTRIA by himselfe hitherto possessed vnto the Archduke: yet so as that the Archduke should take vpon himselfe all the Emperors debt as well in HVNGARIE as in AVSTRIA, and within a yeere should cause sufficient recognizance or caution sealed with his owne hand to be deliuered vnto the creditors. That hee should cause all the letters and writings, as well concerning the vpper AVSTRIA as the nether within the same time to be deliuered vnto him; together with a copie of the priuiledges therein, vntill that deliberation might be had concerning them to be transferred vnto him also. That the Nobilitie and States of BOHEMIA should in the Emperors name ratifie and confirme the treatie held at VIENNA, for the making of the peace betwixt the Emperour, the Turkes and Hungarians. That they also should not refuse at the Emperours request, to promise vnto the Archduke a certaine succession into the kingdome of BOHEMIA, but yet with condition, so that if it should happen the Emperor to die without heires male before the death of the Archduke his brother: but if he should leaue heires male lawfully begotten and vnder age, that in that case he should onely haue the rule and gouernment of the kingdome of BOHEMIA, yet with M certaine Bohemian Councellours joyned vnto him. That the Archduke should by writing confirme vnto the Nobilitie and States of BOHEMIA, that hee should after the vsuall maner and fashion demand the kingdome of BOHEMIA being void of a king. That he should take the vsuall oath of a king, & alwaies haue like regard of all their priuiledges as the other kings

A his predeceſſors had. That the States of Bohemia ſhould not gainesay, but that the Archduke might heereafter vſe the title of the deſigned king of Hvngarie. That the adminiſtration of the Marquiſet of Moravia ſhould bee graunted vnto the Archduke Matthias and his heires, together with the title of a Marqueſſe, vntill that after the death of the Emperour this prouince was againe to reuert vnto him which was to enioy the kingdome of Bohemia. But if it ſhould happen the Archduke to die before the Emperour, the States of Bohemia ſhould not refuſe, but that this prouince ſeparate apart, might (as ſhould ſeeme good) chuſe vnto it ſelfe a patron and defendor, vnto the death of the Emperour. That the Biſhopricke of Almits, hitherto in temporalities ſubject vnto the king of Bohemia, ſhould from thenceforth acknowledge the Archduke Matthias to be the gouernour thereof, leaſt there ſhould
B be a confuſion of ſuites in Moravia, the Biſhop in the meane time hauing regard vnto his owne priuiledges. That the Emperour at the requeſt of the Archduke ſhould maintaine the priuiledges of them of Silesia, and of the States of the ſix cities, and augment them alſo with new priuiledges, being reaſonable and conuenient. That for the defence of the borders againſt the Turks, the nobilitie and States of Bohemia ſhould not contribute more than hitherto they were wont; yet ſauing vnto the Archduke power & abilitie in the generall meetings and aſſemblies of the kingdome to entreat thereof, as the Emperour had hitherto had. That the titles of al the prouinces which the Emperor did now ſurrender vnto the Archduke Matthias, ſhould be ſtill vnto him reſerued. That the Archduke Matthias ſhould vtterly renounce the Countie of Tirali, and ſurrender his part thereof vnto the Emperour. That in C the meetings and aſſemblies to come, the Archduke ſhould by all meanes endeuour, that the Emperour ſhould receiue a reaſonable yearely contribution out of thoſe prouinces which he now departed with. That all offences hitherto committed, ſhould generally bee forgiuen and pardoned, all and euery the perſons on both parties, onely Verkauious excepted, concerning whom, as alſo concerning his debt, the Nobilitie of Moravia had vndertaken in their next aſſemblie to take order. And that armes ſhould on both ſides be layed apart.

Which articles thus agreed vpon, and on both parts accepted of, the Crowne of Hvngarie, with the ornaments thereto belonging, ſuch as are king Stephen his Sword, the golden Apple, with the Croſſe of the kingdome vpon it, two paire of rich ſhooes, a very
D ancient Robe, with a royall Scepter, were by the Emperours chiefe Lieutenant carried into the campe, and there in a broad and open field deliuered vnto the Archduke Matthias: who with his armie in order raunged, and ſixteene thouſand horſe and foot diuided into three battaillons, after hee had receiued theſe royall ornaments, commaunded three great vollies of ſhot to be diſcharged, and afterwards royally feaſted the Emperors embaſſadors. Which pacification thus made, many out of the Archdukes campe, but eſpecially the Hungarians, went into the citie of Prage, there to buy things neceſſarie; and many came alſo out of the citie to ſee the Archdukes campe. But in the meane time certaine inſolent ſoldiors hauing by night broken vp certain ſhops of the Iews, and caried out of them much rich wares, were the cauſe of great ſtirres and tumults in the citie, inſomuch that diuers of the ſouldiors
E were therefore caſt into priſon.

The crowne of Hungarie deliuered vnto the Archduke Matthias.

The firſt of Iuly king Matthias riſing with his armie, departed from before Prage, taking his way with his chiefe counſellors towards Lintze, and diuiding his armie into three parts, that ſo they might the more eaſilier paſſe through thoſe countries home. After the riſing of which armie, a certaine noble Bohemian and a good ſouldiour, called Cottouits, vnto whom the Hungarians and Haiduckes had in this expedition done great harme, with ſix hundred harquebuſiers and a number of countriemen went foorth to a place called Partovitse, where hauing cut off the paſſage, and cut downe trees croſſe the wayes, that none might that way conueniently paſſe, hee with ſuch furie in a place of aduantage charged the Hun-
F garians, comming that way, that hauing ſlaine about nine hundred of them, ſome others were alſo carried away priſoners, with a great bootie of horſes, waggons, and other goods. With which deed the Hungarians grieued, trod downe the corne as they went, and began to ſet fire on the villages and houſes in the countrie thereabouts. But the newes thereof being brought vnto the King, he forthwith by Herbenſtein, Generall of the horſemen, commaunded the Hungarians and Haiduckes not only to deſiſt from this their inſolencie, but themſelues alſo, vpon a great penaltie, to helpe to quench the fires by them raiſed. G

King Matthias entreth into Hungarie, and is royally receiued into Vienna.

In the meane time the comming of K. Matthias being reported at VIENNA, great preparation was there made for the receiuing of him and bringing of him into the citie, according to his royall dignitie: who the 14 of Iuly toward night being come thither, with the Archduke Maximilian his brother, & 3000 horſe, the Archbiſhop of HVNGARIE, who with Count Trautſamius and many other the Emperors counſellors and ſeruants went out of the citie to meet him, and there amidſt eight enſignes of Germane ſoldiors, and 1500 horſmen, as it were ſet in order of battell, receiued him with a long & eloquent Oration, as did afterwards Trautſamius in the name of the States of AVSTRIA, the emperors counſellors alſo honorably welcomming him. Which done, mounting againe to horſe, the king, with the Archduke Maximilian his brother, ſtayed vntill that two troupes of the horſemen of VIENNA (each of them conſiſting of 200 horſe) were all entred into the citie; and afterward, 1500 of Bucheime his horſemen and the aforeſaid eight enſignes of Germanes going before, and the Emperours counſellors following them, the king himſelfe, with the Archduke his brother, & all his train, ſet forward, and paſſing ouer the bridge, whereon three triumphall arches were moſt ſumptuouſly erected, he was by 3000 citizens of VIENNA, gallantly apparelled and armed, with much thundering of the great ordnance and vollies of ſmall ſhot, moſt magnificently receiued, diuers other triumphes and ſports, to manifeſt the ioy of the people, being there made alſo; which for breuitie ſake we paſſe ouer. But being gone a little further, he was by the Senators of VIENNA on horſebacke receiued vnder a rich canopie, borne vp by ſixe of the auncienteſt of the ſaid Senatours, and ſo brought to S. Stephens church: whither hee was no ſooner come, but that lighting from his horſe, he was there receiued by the whole Clergie, and vnder a canopie brought into the Church: where, after Seruice done, hee was with like triumph and magnificence, through diuers other triumphall arches, brought to the caſtle, the great ordnance on all ſides ſtill thundering off from the caſtle, the walls, and bulwarkes of the towne. H I

But theſe triumphes and ſolemnities ended, ſhortly after when as they began to conſult about ſuch things as concerned the good gouernment of the kingdom of HVNGARIE, and the crowning of the king, and that the Proteſtant States of AVSTRIA in many places began to exerciſe their religion according to the manner of the Confeſſion of AVGVSTA, and that the Miniſters began openly to preach in the Churches there, Leopold the Archduke and Biſhop of PASSAVIA comming to VIENNA, with Melinus the Popes Nuntio (but a little before come to PRAGE) with Cardinall Forgatſius and the Biſhop of VIENNA with earneſt and importunate ſoliciting of the king, obtained from him a commandement, That that exerciſe of religion ſhould be againe abrogated, the churches ſhut, & publike preaching forbidden. Which thing forthwith brought forth new ſtirs and troubles in AVSTRIA. For the Proteſtant States forthwith calling a counſell among themſelues, by generall conſent refuſed by oath of loyalty and allegeance to bind themſelues vnto the new king, vntill they had of him obtained the libertie for the free exerciſe of their religion; and combining themſelues together, reſolued euen with the loſſe of their liues and goods to maintaine the free preaching of the Word, and the exerciſe of their religion, according to the Confeſſion of AVGVSTA, and to that end commanded all their ſubjects and tenants to be readie in armes, that need ſo requiring, euery thirtieth man, tenth, or fift might be preſt to come forth vnto the wars. But hauing ſent a ſupplication vnto the king, whereunto 180 of the nobilitie had ſet their hands, & receiuing no anſwer, but that they ſhould deſiſt from their purpoſe, and without delay to make their appearance to take the oath of their allegeance vnto the king, they forthwith the 14 of Septemper going to HORNE, by letters ſent vnto the reſt of the Roman Catholike ſtates, proteſted themſelues to be cleare before God and the whole world of all the euils and miſchiefes that were afterward to enſue, if thoſe ſtates not regarding the appeaſing and ending of thoſe troubles, or the ſafety of them their countrimen, ſhould take their oath of allegeance vnto the king. And ſo forthwith raiſing an army, leaſt vpon the ſuddain they ſhould be at HORNE oppreſſed, they began by al means to prouide for their affaires. But the report thereof comming vnto the ſtates of BOHEMIA and MORAVIA, their neighbours, they were from them giuen to vnderſtand, that they would become interceſſors for them vnto the king, and yet not to be wanting vnto them at their need, as occaſion ſhould require. A In the meane time letters were brought from CONSTANTINOPLE to VIENNA, declaring king Matthias his embaſſadors (hauing audience with the great Sultan) to haue in an eloquent Oration on the kings behalfe promiſed religiouſly to keepe the peace, of late made betwixt him the Othoman Emperour and the Hungarians: and afterward in the kings name to haue offered his preſents vnto the Sultan, and he in the preſence of his chiefe Baſſaes to haue receiued them. But when he came to requeſt the gouernment of TRANSYLVANIA, he would in no wiſe thereto conſent, but gaue the ſame to Gabriel Bathor, with commaundement vnto the Baſſa of BVDA for the eſtabliſhing of him in this Principalitie.

About the beginning of October, the Counties of TRAVTSAME and FVRTSENBVRG were
B from K. Matthias ſent vnto the Proteſtant States at HORNE, and ſhortly after them, Maximilian the Archduke followed alſo: who although they with moſt glorious promiſes ſought to appeaſe them, and by all meanes to draw them to take the oath of their allegeance, yet could they with them no whit preuaile, without granting of them the free exerciſe of their religion. But the 16 of October the Catholike ſtates not expecting the conſent of the Proteſtant ſtates at VIENNA, tooke the oath of allegeance vnto Matthias the new king of HVNGARIE, the great ordnance in the meane time thundring off, with drums and trumpets in euery place of the citie ſounding, and the reſt of the day being with great feaſting, triumph, and ſolemnitie ſpent.

Matthias ſendeth vnto the Proteſtant States at Horne

The Catholicke States take the oath of allegeance vnto king Matthias.

K. Matthias hauing thus at VIENNA receiued the oath of allegeance of the Catholiks, ſhortly after departing thence, the 22 of October comming to PRESBVRG, was there by the nobi-
C litie of HVNGARIE receiued & brought into the citie with 10000 ſoldiors: which ſtates afterwards, viz. the 6 of Nouember, offered in writing vnto the king certaine articles, whereof they deſired to be by him aſſured: moſt of which articles were drawn out of the pacification made at VIENNA the 23 day of Auguſt, in the yeare 1606, the chiefe effect wherof was this: That the free exerciſe of religion ſhould be permitted vnto all men in all the cities & towns of HVNGARIE, not ſo much as that citie excepted wherein the K. ſhould be reſident: That no German captaine ſhould be ſuffered in any the ſtrong forts of HVNGARIE, but that the ſtrong townes of RAB, COMORA, VIVARIA, and others ſhould be committed vnto the gouernment of naturall Hungarians borne: That the crown of HVNGARIE ſhould ſtill be kept in HVNGARIE, and committed to the keeping of temporall men: That firſt and before all other things a Count Palatine ſhould be choſen: That the K. himſelfe ſhould alwaies reſide in HVNGARIE,
D or if not, that the Palatine ſhould in his abſence haue ful power, with the counſellors of eſtate of HVNGARIE, to determine & conclude of all things, & that the K. ſhould therwithall hold himſelfe contented: That no publike office ſhould be beſtowed vpon any, but vpon ſuch naturall Hungarians as had of their countrie well deſerued, nor permitted vnto any for mony: That no Ieſuits ſhould be ſuffred in the kingdome, neither that Eccleſiaſticall men ſhould be ſo much fauoured as formerly they had bin: That officers ſhould not be bound to giue account of the adminiſtration of their offices, but before the treaſurers of PRESBVRG, being naturall Hungarians borne: That from henceforth mony ſhould not be caried out of the kingdome, as hitherto it had bin: That the Palatine being dead, the K. ſhould within a yeare chuſe another, the chiefe Iuſtice in the meane time after the old maner ſupplying his roome.

King Matthias goeth to Preſburg.

Articles by the Hungarians preferred vnto king Matthias at Preſburg.

E The Proteſtant States of AVSTRIA had a little before ſent their embaſſadors vnto the nobilitie and States of HVNGARIE, then gathered together at PRESBVRG, with requeſt, that foraſmuch as they could not by any intreatie obtaine of the K. the free exerciſe of their religion, aſwel withing their cities as without, & that very neceſſitie had driuen them by force of arms to ſeeke for the ſame, that they would by ſending of them men, affoord them ſuch aid as was vnto them due by the former pacification made at VIENNA in the yere 1606. Which troubles of AVSTRIA the nobilitie and States of HVNGARIE deſiring to haue appeaſed, ſent George Turſon & ſome others with letters of interceſſion in their behalf vnto the Archduke Maximilian: which when they had deliuered vnto him, they receiued from him this anſwer, that K. Matthias neuer thought to diſturbe the common quiet of that countrie, or to attempt any thing a-F gainſt the priuiledges therof, granted by the emperor Maximilian of happie memory: but to grant vnto the cities the libertie of religion, he could by no means, partly in reſpect of conſcience, partly for the danger that might therof enſue from the Pope & the K. of SPAINE, & yet neuertheles, that he would promiſe to ſuffer & tollerate the free exerciſe of religion without the cities, and in the beſtowing of the publike offices to haue no reſpect of religion: yet with this condition, that they ſhould lay downe armes, ſubmit themſelues vnto the king, acknow- G ledge their fault, and craue pardon for the ſame; for that in ſo doing the States ſhould happily preuaile more then by force of armes.

The Proteſtant ſtates of Auſtria by the Hungarians aduiſed to lay down armes and to ſubmit themſelues vnto the king.

With which anſwer, ſeeing no better could be got, the Hungarian embaſſadors going vnto the Proteſtant States of AVSTRIA, began by diuers reaſons earneſtly to perſuade them to ſubmit themſelues vnto the king. If the Hungarians ſhould (as they ſaid) giue aid vnto them of AVSTRIA, they ſhould in ſo doing, in ſtead of helping of them, but doe them more harme; for that the Hungarian power could not be brought into AASTRIA, but to the vtter deſtruction thereof. That the league betwixt the Hungarians and them of AVSTRIA was a generall league, and concerned as well the Catholiques as the Proteſtants. That the Chriſtian religion was neuer with the ſword planted or defended, Chriſt himſelf ſaying thē to be happy which H therfore ſuffer perſecution, & commanding Peter to put vp his ſword into his ſcabberd. That it was an eaſie matter for euery man to raiſe ſtirs and tumults, but that again to appeaſe them was a farre harder matter. That by the taking vp of armes, the free exerciſe of religion could not be furthered or prouided for, it being rather dangerous, leſt the contrary part preuailing, it ſhould be vtterly ſuppreſſed. That by this meanes HVNGARIE it ſelfe ſhould be expoſed to many dangers, for that not only new ſtirres might vpon this occaſion by the ſubjects thereof be raiſed, but other forrain princes take vp arms againſt it alſo; the Emperor by force of arms ſeeking for his right, & the Turkiſh Sultan by a new inuaſion going about to bring the ſame vnder his ſubiection: and telling them farther, the Archduke to haue promiſed to take good order for all things, ſo that they would lay downe armes: and that the clemencie and bounty I of thoſe princes being knowne, they were not to doubt, but that they would indeed performe what they had in word promiſed: and that the Hungarians could not now do or attempt any thing againſt the king, but that if it ſhould happen, that theſe two Archdukes being dead without heirs male, the gouernment of theſe two prouinces ſhould come vnto the Archduke Ferdinand, that then they ſhould haue more cauſe to help them of AVSTRIA againſt him. MORAVIA they ſaid to be a free countrey, and yet the king to haue thereunto giuen no more aſſurance for the libertie of religion, more then his bare promiſe. Wherefore ſeeing that both the fortune and chance of warre was doubtfull, and that war was not without the great expence of mony to be maintained, that they were of opinion, it to be beſt for the Proteſtant States of AVSTRIA to lay downe armes, and by way of requeſt to ſolicite their cauſe with the king. K

In the meane time, the griefes whereof the Hungarians complained being taken away, and al controuerſies happily ended, Illiſhaſcius was by a general conſent choſen to be Palatine, & Matthias the 14 of Nouember openly proclaimed king of HVNGARIE, and the 19 of the ſame month in S. Martins church at PRESBVRG in this manner crowned: Firſt, the royal crown was in a ſtately chariot caried out of the caſtle vnto the church, with a great number of the counſellors & nobilitie of the kingdome of HVNGARIE attending the ſame; in which chariot were alſo caried ten enſigns, with the armes of the kindome in them frilled vp: foure of the Hungarian counſellors taking it out of the chariot in a little chiſt couered with cloth of gold, and ſo carying of it into the chancel of the church. After which, K. Matthias, together with the Archduke Maximilian his brother, followed on horſeback, both attired in Hungarian apparell, and ſo going into the chancell, there ſtaied about halfe an houre, vntil that he was by two biſhops L brought forth vnto the altar, before whom ten of the Hungarian nobility caried the ten aforeſaid enſignes: after whom followed the Palatine with the Crowne, Endeodius with the royall ſcepter, Forgatſie with the Apple of the kingdome, Turſo with K. Stephens ſword, Tſechius carrying the Pax (as they call it,) Budian the Croſſe, the Cardinall Forgatſie ſaying Maſſe, with diuers biſhops & prelats helping of him, by whom the king was at the beginning of ſeruice annointed with oyle: where, while the Epiſtle and Goſpell were in reading, the Cardinall ſet the crowne vpon the kings head, al the people crying out, Long liue Matthias the king of HVNGARIE. But the king with the crowne vpon his head taking a drawn ſword out of Sigefrid Collonitz the Marſhals hand, thrice brandiſhed it acroſſe ouer the clergy mens heads, and receiued M the ſacrament at the Cardinals hand. The Maſſe being ended, hee by an high way, couered with cloth, going in his royall robes from S. Martins church vnto the bare-foot Friers church, as he went cauſed mony to be caſt abroad among the people. In which church, after the firſt chapter of the Goſpel of S. Iohn being read, he made 28 knights. Frō thence the king with the crowne

A crowne yet on his head, and in his ſtately robes, went out of the citie at S. Michaels gate, and there on horſebacke was brought vnto an high ſtage couered with cloth, whereon hee was ſworne vnto the Hungarians as their king, and they vnto him as his ſubiects: And afterward thrice mounting vp to horſe vpon a little hill made for that purpoſe, and ſo down again, and thrice brandiſhing his ſword acroſſe, he returned backe againe into the caſtle, where hee with Maximilian the Archduke, Cardinall Forgatſie, the Popes Nuntio, and the Palatine ſat downe at one table, the reſt of the Hungarian nobilitie, to the number of 70, ſitting down at ſix other tables, and ſo dining with great mirth; the Haiducks and common ſort of people being there bountifully feaſted alſo: where many of them, in ſcrambling for the money that was caſt a-
B broad, and in taking vp of the cloth from the ſcaffold, hauing their hands and fingers cut off, and ſo lamed, caried from thence the wofull remembrance of that was there then done.

The ſolemnitie of this coronation thus paſt, K. Matthias thought it good for him yet for a time to ſtay at PRESBVRG, vntil that the new building in the caſtle was ended, which the nobilitie of HVNGARIE had appointed for the keeping of the Crowne of HVNGARIE, to the intent that he himſelfe might ſee the ſame, with other the royall ornaments, put thereinto, and ſealed vp with his owne ſeale: he in the meane while labouring to appeaſe diuers contentions, and to place fit men again in the great offices of the Commonweale: for that the Hungarians would by no means ſuffer the Germans to enioy any of the ſame: for which cauſe many of the chiefe officers, men of great authoritie, were diſplaced; and amongſt them, Sigifrid Collonitz alſo, a man who had moſt wel deſerued of the kingdom of HVNGARIE: howbeit, ſhortly after C he by the counſel of Maximilian the Archduke was by the Hungarians themſelues (repenting them of that they had done) not only reſtor'd vnto his former offices, but had by them (& that not without his iuſt deſert) euen greater preferments offered him alſo: ſo mutable a thing the iudgement of the common people is. Bnt Illiſhaſcius, now the Palatine of HVNGARIE, the 28 day of Nouember talking with the K. Matthias, at large & earneſtly entreated with him in the behalfe of the Proteſtant ſtates of AVSTRIA; eſpecially for that the other Proteſtant ſtates of HVNGARIE ſeemed now in their behalfe to be much moued alſo; and the Morauian embaſſadors openly at the ſame time proteſting, that their ſtates could in no wiſe forſake them, their friends the ſtates of AVSTRIA, if their need ſo required. And albeit that both the Elector of SAXONIE, and other princes of the empire, were become earneſt interceſſors alſo vnto the K. for D them, yet the Popes Nuntio ſo hardly withſtood them, as nothing could as then be granted.

Illiſhaſcius and others in vaine intreat for the ſtates of Auſtria

About the beginning of December the king returning again from PRESBVRG to VIENNA, about the 16 of December the Proteſtant States of AVSTRIA at length ſent Erneſtus the free Baron of LANDAV, Maximilian Polheime, Sebaſtian Grobner, Charles Forberger, Pilgram Sitſendorff, and Chriſtopher Buchner, their embaſſador vnto the king, to bring them anſwer wherunto to truſt: who the 27 of December receiued anſwer, That they ſhould hold themſelues contented with ſuch anſwer as they had before receiued, & to ſubmit themſelues to the K. pleaſure, or els to do what they thēſelues ſaw good. With which anſwer they returning, the ſtates forthwith began to leuie new forces, and to perſuade their ſouldiours, that mindfull of their oathes, they ſhould faithfully ſerue whither ſoeuer and againſt whomſoeuer they were led.

The ſtates prepare themſelues for war.

E And now a great army of the Proteſtant ſtates of AVSTRIA lay in the villages about CREMBSA and SPAINE, ſo that thoſe two towns were thoght to be in great danger of them: for the ſtrengthening of which places, Bucheime was by the K. ſent thither with 1500 horſe & certaine pieces of great ordnance, & an Edict withall publiſhed the 10 of Ianuary, charging the ſtates to be preſent at VIENNA the 21 day of the ſame month, to take the oth of their allegeance to the K. Howbeit, they moſt ſtifly ſtil refuſed ſo to do, or to remit any thing of that which they had before required: inſomuch, that Maximilian the Archducke, who hitherto had not a little labored in this cauſe, was quite out of hope to bring them to any conformitie, or make any good end therof. In the mean time certaine of Bucheime his horſmen on the kings part being about to haue taken vp a place, ſuch as they thought conuenient for thē to lodge in, had like to haue
F bin diſapointed of the ſame by the horſmen of Gerrane, on the ſtates ſide. About which matter Bucheime comming forth with 7 troups of horſmen, & Gerrane but with 3 troupes of horſe, and 3 companies of foot, there was betwixt them an hot skirmiſh for the time fought the 13 of Ianuary: in which skirmiſh 100 of Bucheime his horſmen were ſlain, but of Gerrane his men not ſo many, they hauing the aduantage of the ground, & ſo therwith in the skirmiſh holpen both for the defence of themſelues and the annoying of their enemies. Wherof the king ha- G uing knowledge, and therewith much mooued, beſide the aforeſaid edict, cauſed another to be proclaimed at VIENNA, againſt ſuch ſoldiors as ſerued the Proteſtants; proſcribing them all, and pronouncing them rebels, except before the 21 day of Ianuarie, they laying downe armes, departed out of the Proteſtants campe. Howbeit, the Proteſtant ſtates were ſo far from diſmiſſing their forces, as that they with new ſupplies ſtrengthened the ſame: and hauing taken an hil not far from HALLENBYNNE, and from thence diſcharging three tire of 20 pieces of great ordnance, ſtrucke a great feare and terror into the minds of the kings ſouldiors within the towne.

About this time alſo the ſtates of MORAVIA (that nothing might on their part be wanting H for the making of an attonement betwixt the king and the Proteſtant ſtates of AVSTRIA) ſent ſome of their embaſſadors vnto thoſe ſtates at HORNE, and otherſome vnto the king at VIENNA: who hauing acceſſe vnto the king, declared vnto him the ſtates of MORAVIA, from whom they came, to be earneſtly importuned by the Proteſtant ſtates of AVSTRIA, to ſend them aid according to the agreement made with them the yere before: and told him moreouer, that this maner of his proceeding tended not vnto peace and quietneſſe, but rather vnto the trouble and deſtruction both of the kingdome and of all the other prouinces to him belonging: all that error, the ground of thoſe troubles (they ſaid) to depend of a peruerſe interpretation or miſconſtruing of words, rather than of the matter it ſelfe, ſo that it might by men deſirous of peace eaſily be compoſed and ended. And that therfore the requeſt vnto his Maieſtie was, I
That he hauing regard not onely vnto the good & welfare of his prouinces and ſubiects, but euen of himſelfe and of his honor alſo, would of his clemencie & goodnes vouchſafe to giue remedie vnto the preſent danger, and auert the miſerable calamities now hanging ouer them, and euen readie to fall vpon their heads: The Proteſtant ſtates (they ſaid) to be content to put the controuerſie to be decided and compoſed by certaine graue and wiſe men, to be choſen arbitrators on both parts; yet with this condition, that for the ſpace of 14 daies no hoſtilitie ſhould on either ſide be vſed: that the inhabitants both aboue and beneath AMISVM ſhould be compriſed within this truce: that ſuch as were kept in durance for their religion, ſhould be ſet at libertie: and that all high waies and paſſes ſhould be from all ambuſhes and other dangers cleared. Vnto which their requeſts the king condeſcending, gaue leaue vnto the ſtates of K
MORAVIA, vpon the moſt equall conditions they could deuiſe, to compoſe & end all matters: who ſo laboured in this buſineſſe betwixt the king and the Proteſtant ſtates of AVSTRIA, that at length, viz. the 12 of March, a pacification was made betwixt the king & them his ſubiects, Leopold the Archduke, Melinus the Popes Nuncio, the biſhop of VIENNA, & other great men of the contrary religion and faction, ſeeking in vaine to haue letted the ſame: the chiefe articles and points of which pacification were theſe: That the nobility in their caſtles & towns, as alſo in their houſes in the cities, ſhould for themſelues and their people haue the free exerciſe of their religion: That the free exerciſe of preaching might be vſed in the three churches at ISERSDORF, TRIHELSVINCEL, and HORNE: That the other churches ſhut vp, might againe be opened by three of the Romiſh and three of the reformed religion, and the free exerciſe of L religion in them vſed: That Couuſellors and other publike officers ſhould from thenceforth indifferently be choſen of men of both religions; but that ſuch offices as were hereditarie ſhould ſo ſtill remaine: That the elections of magiſtrates and other publike officers in towns and cities ſhould from thenceforth be made by the magiſtrats & citizens themſelues, and not to be nominated from the Court, as hitherto they had bin: That no church ſhould hereafter be ſhut againſt either part, but their owne churches to be left vnto them both, quietly to vſe: That the townesmen and citizens in their townes and cities ſhould from thenceforth haue power to make choice of their miniſters & preachers: and that for them it ſhould be lawful to viſit the ſick, & to adminiſter vnto them the Lords Supper: That the oath of allegeance ſhold be taken of them of the reformed religion, in like manner as it had bin before taken of them of M
the Romiſh, but yet not with the ſame ceremonies of the Romiſh church: all vnion and confederation with them to be had, to be taken away: that all grudging hatred, & quarrel ſhould be on both ſides forgiuen, & for euer forgotten: Wolfgang of HOFFKIRCH, Volſogius & others remoued & put from their offices, for not taking the oath of allegeance, being again receiued into fauour, and reſtored into their places: That it might be lawfull for the townes and cities

A aboue AMISVM to haue the free exercise of the reformed Religion in their suburbes and hospitals

It was not long after this pacification so made, but that king Matthias the seuenteenth of May going to LINTZE with three hundred horse, was there with eight troupes of horsemen, and fifteene companies of foot, by the States sent foorth to meet him, most honourably receiued, and by three triumphal arches brought into the citie; where hee receiued of the states of the religion, the oath of their obedience: which with much ioy, triumph, and feasting, performed, he the seuen and twentith day of the same moneth againe returned to VIENNA. The aforesaid states of AVSTRIA in the meane time with great zeale continuing the free exercise
B of their Religion at HORNE, a great multitude of people daily resorting vnto the Sermons there made: they of the Romish religion much grieuing and fretting thereat. The king himselfe also being come to VIENNA, put diuers of the Romane Catholiques out of their Offices, and placed others of the reformed religion in their roomes, to the great discontentment of many.

The states of the reformed religion in Austria take the oath of obedience vnto king Matthias.

About this time the Bassa of AGRIA, notwithstanding the peace, had for the summe of twentie thousand crownes before hand payed, secretly compacted with one Andrew Drake, to haue the strong towne of FILEK in the vpper HVNGARIE, deliuered vnto him. Which the traitor had intended (as he himselfe confessed) to haue performed, by setting of the house wherein he himselfe dwelt, by night, on fire: vnto the quenching whereof the garrison soul-
C diours resorting, his purpose was in the meane time to haue secretly let in the Turkes, and so to haue deliuered the towne into their hands. But this his so wicked a purpose in good time discouered, and by him confessed, hee was therefore, as hee had well deserued, aliue cut into foure pieces: a iust reward for his foule intended treason. The Bassa of BVDA also, contrarie to the treatie of the peace, about the same time went about to haue exacted the oath of alleageance of aboue foure hundred countrey villages of the Christians, being not comprised within the foresaid treatie. But as the Turks for their part were secretly plotting how to encroach vpon the Christians, and to do them harme; so the Haiducks on the other side, in great numbers gathered together in the vpper HVNGARIE, began here and there to molest and trouble the Turkes, vntill they were by their superiours commaunded to desist from so doing,
D for disturbing of the peace.

The Turks seeke secretly to encroach vpon the Christians, and the Christians seeke againe to annoy them.

Now about this time also Illishaschius, the countie Palatine of HVNGARIE, died at VIENNA, a man much beloued of the Hungarians his countrymen, and now by them no lesse lamented for: whose dead bodie was with great honour afterward conueied from VIENNA vnto his owne territorie in HVNGARIE, and there with all funerall pompe buried with his ancestors. In whose stead George Turson was afterward by the generall consent of an hundred and fiftie of the Hungarian nobilitie, chosen Countie Palatine of HVNGARIE, and so with the vniuersall and solemne acclamations of the people saluted.

Illishaschius the Palatine of Hungary dieth.

And now the troubles for religion were scarcely wel ended in AVSTRIA (as is aforesaid) but that the like, or rather worse, began forthwith, euen for the same quarell, to arise in BOHEMIA,
E the Hussites (as they call them) most earnestly importuning the Emperour for the free exercise of their religion, or rather for the taking away of certaine grieuances done to their religion: and the Romane Catholiques euen at the same time, leauing nothing vnattempted, which might serue to bring them of the Religion into hatred with the Emperour, and others sitting at the helme of the gouernement of the estate, and so to frustrate whatsoeuer the Emperour had in the generall assembly of the States, the last yeare graunted vnto them of the religion, for the free exercise and aduauncement thereof. The composing of which controuersie (tending vnto the rending in sunder of the whole kingdome) when as the Emperour had referred vnto certaine of his chiefe Counsellors, and they altogether fauouring the Romane Catholiques, would giue them of the religion no certaine answer whereon to rest; they there-
F with much discontented, as out of hope to bee by them relieued, and in great feare to bee by their aduersaries, as enemies vnto the state, oppressed, laid their heads together, and after good deliberation taken, what were best for them to doe, both for the safetie of themselues, their wiues, children, and religion: they by a generall consent, of themselues appointed the fourth of May to hold a generall meeting of them of the religion, in the new court at PRAGE, there there to consult of all matters concerning the businesse of religion. And yet in the meane G time openly in parliament protesting by the mouth of Wenceslaus Bodouitsius, a Baron of Bo-HEMIA, Them to haue appointed this assembly for the Emperours good, and for the common quiet of the whole realme; as also for the better informing of the Emperour of all matters: and to prouide that the Emperour and the kingdome might not through the meanes and persuasions of those his euill counsellors be brought into extreme perill and danger. Immediately after, the *S*tates of the Religion with all speed dispatched their embassadours vnto king Matthias, the Elector Palatine, the Duke of SAXONIE, and the Duke of BRVNSVVICK, to request them, by their intercession to become mediators for them vnto the emperour, for the obtaining of the free exercise of their Religion, which in all points agreed with the Con- H fession of AVGVSTA, and which long before was exhibited vnto Maximilian the Emperour, and by him allowed. Now in the meane time these the States of the Religion were by some the Emperour, he complaining vnto himselfe of the inconsideratnesse of his counsellors; to maintaine his authoritie, caused the parliament then in hand to be proroged; and to seeme of himselfe to grant that which he could not wel withstand, commanded by a decree, that same very day to be appointed for the concluding of that article of religion, on which the States themselues had before appointed their assembly to be holden in the new court at PRAGE. Notwithstanding which decree, many troublesome spirits publikely set forth other their conceits I in writing, to farre other purpose, grieuously therein reprehending the states of the Religion, for that of themselues they had appointed a day for their assembly into the new court at PRAGE: Which (as they said) was nothing else, but in a rebellious manner to rise against the lawes of the kingdome, and the authoritie of their lawfull prince: AND therfore aduised them to forbeare from making any such assembly as was by them appointed. Heereof arose great troubles euen vnder the Emperours nose in PRAGE, the chiefe citie of BOHEMIA, they of the Religion not daring to trust the Romane Catholiques, neither they them; being still readie vpon euery false report, or vaine surmise, to go together by the eares: vntill that the Emperor for the staying of these troubles, and the auoiding of further danger, was glad to cause it to be openly proclaimed in the new court at PRAGE, That his Imperiall Maiestie hauing receiued K and vnderstood the Apologie of the states, now did abrogate that his edict published against them but a few daies before: and by this his new edict did account all the states of the Religion for his faithfull and well beloued subiects: and as of them vnto whom the right of the kingdome, and the king his oath belonged, as wel as to all other states of the kingdome. And that he also had those the same states excused, in that they for the good of his Maiestie, and of the whole kingdome, had appointed their assembly in the new court at PRAGE: and that therfore he denounced them in so doing, not in any thing to haue done any thing contrary vnto his Maiestie. And that hee appointed the fiue and twentieth day of May, for the generall assembly of parliament to be holden in the castle of PRAGE, for the ending of the article concerning religion, and the reforming of other the publike grieuances of the common weale: yet L with this prouiso, That the said States should safely and quietly come vnto the said parliament, without entertaining of any forreine souldiors; as that his Maiestie should also, not by himselfe nor any other, for pay entertaine any, or suffer any forreine souldiors to come into the kingdome. Which the Emperors edict being proclaimed, the states of the Religion hauing made their publike praiers, and sung certaine Hymnes and Psalmes vnto the glorie of God, for the good successe of their businesse, left the new court at PRAGE, and returned euerie man home to their owne houses, to make themselues readie to come vnto the parliament to be holden at the appointed day.

But the day appointed for the parliament being come, and the Emperor still delaying the with deluded, as hauing not receiued from the Emperour any such answere as whereon to rest, the third of Iune offered vnto the Emperour a short writing, concerning their griefe and further purpose, to this effect. They had (as they said) expected, and well hoped, that regard being had not onely of so many requests of so great and most noble princes, made in

A their behalfe; but euen of the Emperour his promiſe alſo, made vnto them, both in the generall aſſembly of the States the laſt yeare, and in the late precept of the Emperours alſo, they ſhould at length haue receiued ſuch anſwere vnto their petition, concerning the free exerciſe of their Religion, as whereon they might haue ſafely reſted. Which for that it had not been yet done, they referred the doing thereof vnto God and future time, imputing the blame therof not vnto his Imperiall maieſtie, but vnto the vnquiet & troubleſome natures of ſome as well the Eccleſiaſticall as Temporall magiſtrates and perſons. But for as much as they meant not longer to be deluded by their enemies, and much leſſe to be defrauded of his Maieſties royall promiſe, which was now vnto the world knowne, they had thought good to offer and preſent vnto his Maieſtie a writing conceiued in the Bohemian tongue: according
B vnto which they deſired to bee ſecured, concerning the free exerciſe of their Religion; moſt humbly requeſting his Maieſtie to accept of the ſame, and at length to ſatisfie their requeſts. Which if it might not be graunted (the Emperour his Maieſtie hauing more reſpect vnto the troubleſome Cleargie men, and ſome other his euill affected counſellors, than to the faithfull States and ſubiects of his kingdome) that then they would reſt themſelues vpon the decree made in the aſſembly holden in the yeare 1608, and vpon the laſt edict of his Maieſtie: yet with this ſolemne proteſtation, That ſeeing they had by certain information vnderſtood, much warlike preparation (but eſpecially in Bavaria) to bee made, and diuers conſultations in many places to be holden againſt the ſtates of the Religion (his Imperiall Maieſtie and the other his faithfull counſellors, therof not knowing) which might tend vnto the ruine and de-C ſtruction both of his maieſtie and of the whole kingdome: they themſelues would take vpon them the defence thereof, and to doe their endeauour, that furniſhed with men and armes, they might to the vttermoſt of their power defend him their Soueraigne, together with themſelues, and the whole kingdome, againſt the force and inuaſion of their forraine enemies.

Embaſſadors from the Duke of Saxonie in the behalfe of the States.

In the meane time while theſe things were thus in doing, an embaſſadour came from the duke of Saxonie to Prage, to intreat the Emperour for the States, and for the graunting of them the free exerciſe of their religion: the embaſſadors of the ſtates of Silesia foorthwith following of them alſo, who in like manner requeſting alſo of the Emperour, to haue the li-D bertie for the free exerciſe of their religion by him confirmed vnto them, promiſed their moſt readie helpe and aid vnto the States of Bohemia, if need ſhould ſo require. But the States of Bohemia hauing from day to day in vaine expected anſwere from the Emperour, turning themſelues vnto their former reſolution for the defence of themſelues and of their Religion; forthwith raiſed a great number both of horſe and foot, whom with their well knowne captaines and commanders they brought euen vnto the citie of Prage. Howbeit at length, viz. the eleuenth of Iuly, the Saxon embaſſadors earneſtly ſoliciting their cauſe, and vrging their requeſt, they according to their deſire receiued anſwer from the Emperour, by letters from his Maieſtie written to this effect.

The States of Bohemia raiſe their forces.

The emperor his letters vnto the States of the Religion in Bohemia, for the free exerciſe of their Religion.

Hee gaue all men (as hee ſaid) to vnderſtand, and by theſe his letters witneſſed to eternall memorie, That after that all the three States of his kingdome of Bohemia, which, in the re-
E ceiuing of the Lords ſupper, participate the bodie and blood of our Lord Chriſt Ieſus, vnder both kindes, his faithfull ſubiects, had in the aſſemblie holden in the caſtle at Prage in the yeare 1608, in all humilitie requeſted, That it might be lawfull for them to hold, and freely to exerciſe their Religion, according to the Confeſſion of Avgvsta (as ſome call it) exhibited vnto his father Maximilian the Emperour of moſt happie memorie, and by him vnto the ſaid States allowed: and that he then and at that time, by reaſon of other moſt weightie buſineſſe, for which that aſſemblie was then called, and ſuch as could ſuffer no procraſtination or delay, had thought it good to deferre the allowing and ratifying of this their petition, vnto this preſent aſſembly of Parliament: and that the ſame States now againe aſſembled, inceſſantly renewing this their former petition, and hauing thereunto ioyned alſo the requeſt and F interceſſion of certaine noble perſonages, had requeſted to be therein ſatisfied: and that hee with his Counſellours would conſult how prouiſion might bee made for his ſubiects in the kingdome of Bohemia, as well communicating vnder both kindes, as vnder one; now at length to haue effected the ſame. Wherefore ſeeing that his will and deſire was, that both

in these and future times peace and quietnesse might for the encreasing of the kindome bee G preserued and kept amongst his subiects of all the three estates of the kingdome of BOHEMIA, communicating as well vnder the one, as vnder both kindes: that both parties might freely and without any impediment or let, haue the free exercise of their religion, whereby they were both in hope to obtaine euerlasting saluation. And to the intent that accomplishment and satisfaction might in all points bee made, as well according vnto the breaking vp of the assembly of Parliament in the yeare 1608, as to the performance of his owne precept, of late published (whereby he hath acknowledged, and euen yet acknowledgeth, those same Estates communicating vnder both kindes, and subscribing to this confession, for his faithfull and loyall subiects, vnto whom the rights and immunities of H the kingdome of BOHEMIA belonged) hee by the common consent of the Councellours, and other Magistrates of the kingdome did determine, That his subiects communicating both vnder one and both kindes, should friendly and peaceably liue together, without wronging or reuiling of one another; and that vpon the paine and penaltie in the law set downe, to bee inflicted vpon them that should otherwise doe. And moreouer, seeing that they which communicated but vnder one kinde, enioyed the free exercise of their Religion in all poynts throughout the kingdome of BOHEMIA, that hee gaue leaue and commaunded, that they also which communicated vnder both kindes, viz. all the States of the Religion, with all such a embraced the Confession of BOHEMIA, sometime exhibited to Maximilian the Emperour his father, in the Parliament holden in the yeare I 1575, and now againe to himselfe presented, should euerie where, and in all places of the kingdome, haue the free exercise of their Religion, without the let or interruption of any; to retaine the same, vntill a generall vnion of Religion, and an ending of all dissention and controuersies might bee made. Moreouer, That hee did graunt vnto the States of the Religion this fauour, That they should haue the lower Consistorie at PRAGE, with power to conforme the same according to their owne Confession. That they might lawfully make their Priestes, as well in the Bohemian as Germane tongue, and set them ouer their Churches, without any let of the Archbishop of PRAGE. That hee did also restore vnto them the Vniuersitie of PRAGE, which for many yeares agoe belonged vnto the States of the Religion vnder both kinds: giuing them power againe to open the same, K to furnish it with graue and learned men of their owne Confession, to beautifie it with good Lawes, and to appoynt certaine of their owne companie and profession for Gouernours, and defendours as well of the Consistorie as of the Vniuersitie: whome so by the States appointed and chosen, hee without any stay or delay, or other instruction or information than they should from the States receiue, would confirme in that their office, and pronounce them for the lawfull Defendors: yet so, as that if hee being letted by other greater businesse, cannot perfourme the same within the space of foureteene dayes, they shall neuertheless continue Defendours, and as well enioy the charge of the office committed vnto them, as if they had beene therein by him confirmed: and that one or other of their number beeing dead, it shall bee lawfull for the States to chuse other in their places. And if that beside L
the Churches which they now holde, they would build other moe, or erect moe schooles for the instructing of the youth, it shall bee lawfull for them freely and without any let so to doe, as well in the cities as in the countrey townes and villages. And for as much as in some of the cities of the kingdome of BOHEMIA, men of both religions dwelt together, hee therefore did will and commaund, That for the preseruation of peace and quietnesse, either part freely exercising their Religion, and obeying their Priestes, should by no meanes either hurt or trouble them on the other part; and much lesse to hinder them to burie their dead in their Churches or Church-yards, with the ringing or tolling of the bells, or goe about to turne any man from his Religion, of what state or condition soeuer hee bee, whether hee dwell in the citie or in the countrey towne or village; or by force to draw M them to their opinion, or to take their part. For that hee onely respected that peace and quietnesse might bee kept, and that mutuall loue might still grow amongst all the three States: Vnto which end and purpose, that hee for himselfe and his heires, and the Kings of BOHEMIA, his Successours, in the Faith and word of a King, did graunt and promise vnto the States

A States of the Religion vnto whome this common peace of Religion (as they call it) belongeth as to a principall member of the Empire, all theſe things to be for euer inuiolably kept, (the Eccleſiaſticall and temporall perſons whoſoeuer in vaine reſiſting) ſo that no contrarie precept or edict ſhould either by himſelfe, or any other his heires or ſucceſſors bee publiſhed againſt the States of the Religion, or being publiſhed by any, ſhould be accounted effectuall and ſtrong: eſpecially ſeeing that hee by theſe his letters, pronounceth all the Edicts hitherto publiſhed againſt theſe the States of the Religion, to bee void, fruſtrate and of none effect. Neither would that any thing of thoſe, which were done by the States of the Religion, whileſt they ſought for the confirmation of this article concerning Religion, ſhould
B for euer be laied to their charge, or by any man by way of reproch obiected vnto them. And that therefore he ſtraitly charged and commaunded all Magiſtrates, and ſuch as bare rule in BOHEMIA to the vttermoſt of their power, to protect and defend all the three States together with them of the Religion: and neither themſelues to trouble them, nor to ſuffer them to bee by any others for the exerciſe of their Religion, moleſted or troubled: For that hee and other the kings of BOHEMIA, his ſucceſſours would moſt ſeuerely chaſtiſe all ſuch as ſhould offend againſt theſe his Maieſties letters (which to bee for euer remembred, he would cauſe the ſame to bee enrolled in the publique Recordes of Parliament) whether ſuch offendors were Eccleſiaſticall or Temporall men, to bee ſharply puniſhed as the troublers of the common peace.

C This was the ſumme of his maieſties letters which he cauſed to bee publikely ſet vp in the caſtle at PRAGE the thirteenth of Iuly, that it might bee to all men knowne, this article of religion, which was the firſt of the Articles in this Parliament propounded, to bee concluded and agreed vpon according to the minde of the States of the Religion, and ſo their requeſtes to be in all poynts ſatisfied. Who forthwith thereupon the fifteenth day of Iuly, cauſed the firſt publique Sermon according to the confeſſion of AVGVSTA, to bee preached in the Germane tongue in a Church of them of the Religion, which had for a long time before beene ſhut vp. At which time they alſo ſent vnto the Elector of SAXONIE, to ſend vnto them certaine learned men, for the ſetting vp of the Vniuerſitie, and the gouerning of the Conſiſtorie at PRAGE. And yet for all this, the Embaſſadors for the States of SILESIA ſtill earneſtly labo-
D ring with the Emperour for the libertie of Religion to be granted to the ſaid States and the reſt of the inhabitants of that prouince; the ſtates of BOHEMIA refuſed in any wiſe to diſmiſſe their ſouldiors whom they had muſtered neere vnto ROGGENSON, vntill the Sileſians were of their requeſt in that point ſatisfied: offring alſo vnto the Emperour a large libell of the griefes of them the ſaid States.

Now it may be that ſome hauing read ſo much as is before written concerning theſe late troubles, about the free exerciſe of the reformed religion, but ſpecially in BOHEMIA, AVSTRIA, MORAVIA, and SILESIA, may deeme the ſame both tedious and beſide our purpoſe: vnto whom in deed it is not written, but rather vnto ſuch as who together with my ſelfe, the wars betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turkes ended, and the peace concluded as is aforeſaid, deſire
E yet to know in what ſtate thoſe frontier countries ſtand; which being the greateſt bulwarkes of that ſide of Chriſtendome, and the chiefe territorie of the houſe of AVSTRIA, are (the peace being either expired, or otherwiſe broken off) moſt ſubiect vnto the fury of the puiſſant enemie, as neereſt vnto him, and ſo like ſooneſt to feele of his great force and power, preſining vnto it ſelfe neither bounds nor meaſure, ſo long as there is any thing farther. Againſt whom the Chriſtian Emperor had no other forces of his owne to oppoſe, more than ſuch as he could raiſe out of the relikes of HVNGARIE, and the aforeſaid frontier countries. All, together, but weake helps againſt ſo puiſſant an enemie, as neuer commeth into the field, but with a world of men following of him: but yet much weaker being (as now of late they were) enerie of them apart diuided in themſelues about matters of Religion, the incurable maladie of F the Chriſtian eſtates and common weales, the heauy and lamentable effect wherof too much of late appeared in the loſſe of STRIGONIVM, woon by the Turks with a farre leſſe armie, than euer the Grand ſigniors lieutenant generall was wont to come into HVNGARIE withall: and yet the chriſtian Emperor by reaſon of the reuolt of the Hungarians (vpon a diſcontentment about the exerciſe of their Religion) not able of himſelfe to releeue the diſtreſſed citie of

STRI-

STRIGONIVM, or yet to put an armie of any ſtrength into the field, for the defence of the reſt of his cities or territories. So weake are euen the greateſt princes, their ſubiects being among themſelues in minds diuided. G

The Turkes embaſſador commeth to Vienna & from thence to Prage.

But not to ſtray further, the Turkes embaſſadour in the meane time with a notable traine of an hundred and fiftie Turks comming from VIENNA the one and twentith of September, and there hauing ſaluted, and with great gifts preſented the king, ſet forward toward PRAGE, where he was by the citizens and certaine of the Nobilitie of the Emperours Councell, the twelfth of October honourably receiued; and the nineteenth of the ſame moneth admitted vnto the Emperours preſence, firſt preſented vnto him from the great Sultan his maſter, a rich tent of diuers colours, moſt curiouſly wrought with faire orient pearle, of great value; and then foure couragious horſes, all furniſhed with moſt rich and ſumptuous furniture. He H preſented vnto him alſo, certaine Turkiſh weapons, ſet and garniſhed with rich precious ſtones, and a princely Turks robe, ſuch as they vſe at their mariages, gliſtering with gold and pretious ſtones, with diuers other rare things of leſſe value. Together with which hee deliuered vnto him the great Sultans letters, and withall deſired the confirmation of the peace before made for twentie yeares, to be now againe renewed. Vnto which embaſſador, letters were afterward deliuered from the Emperour, together with certaine other rich preſents, to bee by him preſented vnto the great Sultan: viz. certaine Carroches lined within with Damaske, and couered without with blacke Veluet; ſixe faire and gallant horſes, moſt richly furniſhed: a clocke of wonderfull workmanſhip; two faire deskes to write vpon of Ebonie; with diuers other like preſents of no ſmall price. I

Who ſo charged with preſents, and bountifully rewarded, and to his good liking anſwered, was afterward in the beginning of Ianuarie, with a traine of two hundred horſe, from PRAGE honourably diſmiſſed.

Here followeth a continuation of this Hiſtorie, with all the occurrents which haue happened during the reignes of Achmat, Muſtapha, and Oſman the ſonne of Achmat, to the end of this preſent yeare 1620.

By EDVVARD GRIMSTON, Sargeant at Armes.

THe Turkiſh Emperour, hauing beene freed ſome yeares from the care of warres in HVNGARIE, in regard that he had concluded a truce for twentie yeares with the Emperour Rodulphus, he now bent all his forces againſt his rebels in ASIA, and the Sophie of PERSIA, where he had no good ſucceſſe this yere. For the Perſians hauing formerly extended their monarchie farre into the Turkes empire, and defeated Cicala Baſſa and others in diuers battels, now they entred into the prouince of BABYLON, with a deſigne to ioyne it to PERSIA. Achmat to ſtay the courſe of their proſperitie, ſends a mightie armie thither, vnder the command of Naſſut Baſſa: But his fortune was no better than thoſe that went before him. The Perſians came to meet him, gaue him battel, defeated him, and ſlew 20000 of his men. Theſe mournfull newes comming to court, did much diſtemper the Sultans mind, he could not indure it ſhould be ſaid that the Perſian had defeated his mightie armies thrice in open battell; and much leſſe that it ſhould be ſo, and that he ſhould ſeize vpon his countreys: wherefore to repaire this loſſe, he leuies new forces to be commanded by Gambolat Baſſa of ALEPPO, who had been the moſt powerfull rebell in ASIA, and was newly reconciled and brought into fauour with the graund Seignior. This man came to the Port to receiue the Sultans commandements, and to paſſe his armie into ASIA: but whether hauing ſome ſuſpition, that he had intelligence with the Perſians, or that ſuch as enuied his greatneſſe, had giuen ſome bad impreſſion of his loyaltie to the Sultan: within ſome few dayes after his arriuall, Achmat cauſed him to be ſlaine by his Capigi: whereby wee may well obſerue, that he that is a rebell to his prince, which hath ſo violently oppreſt his ſubiects, & ſet his countries on fire by ſedition, the which he hath beene forced to quench with the blood of innocents, cannot but end his daies violently and miſerably, ſeeing that God reuengeth the blood of innocents vpon the guiltie.

The Turkes defeated.

The Turke makes Gambolat Generall of his armie.

He commands him to be ſlaine

The Perſian ſeeing what aduantage he had gotten of the Turke, laboured by the bruit of his victories, to draw the Chriſtian princes vnto his partie, and with them wholly to ruine the Othomans, the which he had ſo happily begun. For the effecting whereof, he ſent his embaſſadors to the emperor being at PRAGE, to perſuade him to break the peace with the Turk, & to ioyne with him. The embaſſadors arriued at PRAGE this yeare with rich & rare preſents: firſt a croſſe of gold inricht with many precious ſtones, amongſt which there was one piece of amber, wheron was ſeen the figure of the virgin Marie, holding her yong babe in her armes, the which was ſo artificially grauen, as it might be thought the worke of nature: a topas of exceeding greatnes, giuen to the king of PERSIA by an Indian king: two kniues of damaske, with hafts of iaſper, & their ſheaths couered with diamonds: a certaine kind of Indian wood of moſt excellent vertue, moſt ſoueraign to cure the paines of the breſt, and to purge the ſtomack: the gall of a pellican excellent to cure the pleuriſie, appoplexie, and feuer: two topazes the one white, and the other violet; this laſt was ſo big, as it was capable to make a cup: an amathiſt as big as a hens egge; a Perſian bow, inlaid with the veines of a cammel, and a rough diamond exceeding great; a white ſtone of the colour of water, which was a preſeruatiue againſt the plague, being hung about ones neck; three orientall pearls exceeding big; three rich eſcarbuncles, and three marueilous faire diamonds; and withal this a ſerpents horne, much eſteemed for the rare vertues. All theſe preſents were very well accepted, and the embaſſadors much honored. But what apparance was there for the emperor who had ſo great differences with his brother Matthias king of HVNGARIE, who ſaw the greateſt part of his ſubiects rebelled againſt him, his prouinces in deuiſion, TRANSYLVANIA in combuſtion, by the conſpiracie which had bin diſcouered againſt Battori, and finally a generall diſorder ouer all, to break the peace with the Turk, who was at his dore, retained only with this barre, and to allie himſelfe with the Perſian ſo farre from his countries, from whom hee could draw no ſuccours, but onely that he might keepe the Othoman busie in Asia. Thus the Embassadors returned, carying home nothing but good words. G

The proceedings of Leopold in Bohemia.

Since, the troubles which hapned in Bohemia, made him see of what importance it was to entertaine peace with the Turke: for if he had broken it by the Persians persuasion, hee had giuen his enemy an assured meanes to ruine him: for the Archduke Leopold entred Bohemia with an armie of 9000 foot, and 3000 horse; he surprised pettie Prage, attempted the old town, and seeking to force it, he slew many which made resistance. Mathias king of Hvngarie aduertised of this disorder, parts from Avstria with a powerful army, & aduanceth speedily towards Bohemia. It was to be feared, that if Mathias army & Leopolds had met neere vnto Prage, it had bin the losse and ouerthrow of the one, and the desolation & ruine of the country. The Emperour foreseeing this danger, caused 300000 florins to be deliuered to Romeo, H Leopolds lieutenant for the paiment of his armie, & so sent him out of Bohemia. This diuision betwixt the princes of the house of Avstria, grew by the practises of some of the Emperors counsell, who being delegated iudges to compound the differences of the Bohemians of diuers religions, instead of labouring to reconcile and vnite those people, for the good of the publike, they made themselues partisans to the one to oppresse the other, and thereby they drew the princes into a dangerous deuision, for the support of parties. And moreouer, the Archdukes Ferdinand and Leopold, practised to depriue Matthias king of Hvngarie of the succession which he pretended of Bohemia; left that being master, he should take reuenge vpon their partisans for the troubles wherwith they had formerly afflicted the countrey. Such was the estate of affaires in Germanie, giuing the Turke a faire opportunitie, if he could haue I imbraced so rich an occasion, to make his profit of their combustions. But the confirmation of the truce, and the affaires of his house, kept him in Thrace.

The gallions of Malta defeated by the Turks.

Let vs see how the Turke speedes at sea, where he hath the knights of Malta, the Sicilians, and Neapolitanes, and the Florentines, vigilant and valiant enemies to annoy him, and crosse his designes. The last yeare, which was 1609, the Christians had no good successe, losse fell particularly vpon the knights of Malta: for he that fights often, can hardly vanquish alwayes. The gallion of the order, commaunded by Chevalier Guidoti, an Italian, had made two voyages to sea very fortunately, and brought to Malta 300 Turkish slaues. The incouragement of this good successe ingaged many knights to diuers enterprises. They armed certaine gallions, and made a fleet of ten good ships of warre, as vnfortunate in their K courses as the gallion of the order had been before successefull: for meeting with the Turkes fleet in the seas of Cyprvs, they were set vpon and most of them slaine or made slaues. The knight Fressinet was slaine, and the red gallion wherein he commanded taken by the Turks: but it was after a whole daies fight. Ambuson otherwise called Fueillade another knight, was made a slaue, and his gallion taken: the knight Ouges ran the same fortune, with the losse of a gallion. Fressinet hauing brought a pinnace with him to attend his ship, after some fight neer vnto the gallion, it escaped by night. In this voiage vnfortunat for them of Malta, the gallion of the order would needs seek some better aduenture: the knights of Baillon, and Rhodes did accompany him either of them with a small gallion. He set vpon the carauan of the Turkes fleet, neer the island of Rhodes, his successeful beginning of this combat made him hope for L victory, & the number of the enemies vessels for a rich booty: for there were among the rest 2 great gallions of the Sultans; these are ships which belong to the great Seigniors women, loaden commonly with great riches: but 20 gallies of Rhodes seeing this fight, came out of their port to succor them, and by the fauour of a faire wind, drew them into safetie.

At Malta the brute was that the Turks armie consisting of fourescore gallies, should go and besiege the isle of Goza, whereas a knight called Saint-Liger commaunded. Whereupon the Great Master had resolued to fortifie the castle of the island with a good counterscarfe, which hee caused to bee made, sending thither two hundred souldiours, and thirtie knights for supplie, all braue souldiors, who might haue made a great resistaunce, if the Turkes had attempted it: but the enemies fleete passed one, and gaue them time M to rest.

But this yeare 1610, Vignancourt the Great Maister of Malta, sent the fiue Gallies of the order into Barbarie, towards port Farino, memorable, for that it was the hauen where Saint Lewis the French King ended the nauigation of his dayes,

and

A and at his returne from IERVSALEM and PALESTINA, went to receiue in heauen the glorious palmes of his holy actions. The gallies of BISERTA had beene accuſtomed to fetch palmes there in that ſeaſon (which was in the ſpring time) whom the gallies of MALTA had a deſigne to ſurpriſe. But the contrary winds, and the tempeſtuous ſeas ouerthrew that enterpriſe, yet their voyage was not altogether vnprofitable; for returning towards MALTA, being within the chanell, which diuides the Iſland from that of SICILIE, they encountred with a great gallion of TVNES, armed by a Turke called Carouſinan, being in view of the gallies of MALTA: The Rayſe, (who commaunded) aſſured his companie, and (ſmiling) promiſed to free them from their enemies. Being ſo tranſported with vanitie, as he ſpake confidently, that he would B not feare twentie of the gallies of MALTA; but this his pride was ſoone abated with his ruine: for the fiue gallies came cloſe vnder him, and plyed him ſo furiouſly with their cannon, as they ſunke him. The gallie wherein Verdelli an Italian knight commaunded, had like to haue been loſt, for being grapled with the gallion, if the diligence of Verdelli had not ſpeedily retired it. The Turkes after the loſſe of their veſſell, began to ſwimme away, but they were all made ſlaues to ſerue in the gallies of MALTA, who this yeare had no other fruits of their generous enterpriſes.

They ſinke a gallion of Tunes.

The gallies of Coſmo de Medicis great duke of TVSCANIE, parted from LIGORNE, vnder the conduct of the commaunder, and Admirall Inghirami, and running alongſt the coaſt of BARBARIE, they took a Turkiſh ſhip in the ſight of ALGIER, loaden with merchandiſe, armes C and munition of warre, freeing many Chriſtian ſlaues which were in it. This happie beginning promiſed them better fortune. They paſſe on, and ſome 25 leagues beyond ALGIERS; they goe to ſurprize the towne of BISQVERRE, a ſmall towne in circuit, but ſtrong and well walled. Inghirami drawing neere vnto the coaſt, tooke downe his maſts, leſt they ſhould diſcouer his comming. In the meane time he ſent two long boats to find ſome place fit for their landing; the which being carefully obſerued, colonel Bindij landed his men, and about eleuen a clocke at night marched in good order towards the towne, and forced it. The darkneſſe of the night kept them from ſpoyling it; Being content onely to ſet their guards and centinels in the moſt important places of the wall: but day being come, the ſouldiours made themſelues maiſters of the towne, which they ſackt and ſpoyled. Certaine Moores and D Turkes, during the obſcuritie of the night, had retired themſelues into a Moſque which they fortified: They were ſummoned to yeeld; but the feare of being ſlaues, (which they could not auoyd) made them reſolue to die in their owne defence; ſo as the Florentines hauing forced the place, put them all to the ſword; and then imbarqued their troupes, hauing filled BISQVERRE with fire and blood. The night following, being in the Gulph called the Bad woman, they met with a pinnace loaden with corne, the which they tooke, and ſent to LIGORNE, and then they paſt on to increaſe their conqueſt. Being vpon the coaſt of SARDINIA, two Galliots of BISERTA, did furniſh them with a faire occaſion. Inghirami ſends his gallies to purſue them, who hauing had them in chace threeſcore leagues, tooke the one, wherein they had one hundred and twentie ſlaues, and freed manie E poore Chriſtians from the chaine, who ſuffered the tyrannie of the Turkiſh ſeruitude. They alſo tooke a Turkiſh gallie within halfe a league of ALGIER, and ſpoyled it. And thus triumphing ouer their enemies, they tooke their courſe towards LIGORNE, hauing taken foure Turkiſh veſſels, ſpoyled the towne of BISQVERRE, and twice braued that of ALGIER.

This yeare was fatall for the Moriſques or new Chriſtians in SPAINE, who being in number 900000 perſons, as the originall writes, and had continued there from father to ſonne, for the ſpace of almoſt 900 yeares, were now in an inſtant baniſhed, and made vagabonds with a blaſt of the kings mouth. Men diſcourſed diuerſly heereof; Some ſaid that the King had reaſon to doe it, for that they had ſecret practiſes and intelligence with the F Turke his capitall enemie. Others affirmed, that hee did wiſely to preuent their attempts againſt his Eſtate, which were to bee feared conſidering their numbers were ſo great. And ſome ſaid plainely, that it was to haue their lands and inheritances, which had continued ſo long in their races. But the king declared his owne intent by his Edict, the which hee publiſhed in theſe tearmes.

The Moriſques or new Chriſtians chaſed out of Spaine.

The king of Spaines edict.

The King. For that reaſon doth in conſcience binde a good and Chriſtian gouernment, G to expell out of all Realmes and Common weales thoſe things which breed ſcandall, and bring hurt to our good ſubiects, and daunger to the Eſtate, but eſpecially which are offenſiue to God, and preiudiciall to his ſeruice: for this cauſe experience hauing taught vs, that the reſidence of the new Chriſtian Moriſques, and their abode in the realmes of GRANADO, MVRCIA, and ANDELOSIA, hath beene the cauſe of all theſe inconueniences: For that beſides the manner of their proceeding, which ioyned in the rebellion of GRANADO, the which began by cruell murthers of all the Prieſtes and old Chriſtians which liued amongſt them, calling the Turke in to their aid; yet hauing drawen them out of the ſaid Countrey, and ſuffered them to liue in our other prouinces, ſo as they would repent them of their faults, and liue faithfully and Chriſtian like, according to the precepts and iuſt or- H dinances, which were giuen them: They haue not obſerued and kept them according to the ſtrict and direct rules of our holy Faith: but haue alwayes made ſhew to contemne it, and to haue no feare to offend God, as hath beene ſeene by the great numbers which haue beene puniſhed by the Inquiſition: and beſides, they haue committed many theſts and murthers againſt the old Chriſtians. And not content heerewith, they haue conſpired a-gainſt my royall Crowne and Realmes, ſeeking ayd and ſuccours from the Turke, certaine interpoſed perſons being ſent to that effect, and doing the like with other princes, promiſing vnto themſelues ayde and aſſiſtance, offering vnto them their perſons and meanes. And ſeeing that during ſo many yeares, in which they haue practized theſe treaſons and conſpiracies, not any one hath come to reueale them, but they haue I alwayes couered, concealed, and denied them. It is a moſt apparant ſigne, that they haue all beene of one minde and will, againſt the ſeruice of God and of mee, and a-gainſt the good of this Realme; yet they might haue imitated many Knights of theirs, of generous extraction, who haue done ſeruice to God, to the Kings our progenitours, and to vs, like good Chriſtians, and moſt loyall vaſſals.

Wherefore conſidering all this, and how much I am bound to ſet downe ſome good order, and to procure the preſeruation and increaſe of my Realmes and ſubiects, and de-ſiring to prouide for all, I haue decreed with the aduice and councell of manie iudicious learned men, and others, that are verie religious, wiſe, and iealous of Gods ſeruice and mine, to chaſe out of the ſaid Realmes of GRANADO, MVRCIA, and ANDELO- K SIA, and out of the towne of HERNACHE (although it bee not within the limits of the ſaid Realmes) all the new Chriſtians Moriſques, both men, women, and children. For when as a great or deteſtable crime is committed in any Colledge or Communaltie, It is fit that Colledge or Communaltie ſhould bee ruined, and that the leſſe for the greater, and one with another ſhould bee puniſhed: And that ſuch as peruert the good and ſincere life of Commonweales, and of their townes and cities, ſhould be baniſhed from other inhabitants, leaſt their contagion infect them.

For this cauſe, by vertue of theſe preſents, wee ordaine and commaund, that all the newe Chriſtians Moriſques, without any exception of age or ſexe, of thoſe that liue and reſide in the ſaid Realmes, and in the towne of HERNACHE, except ſuch as bee ſlaues, L ſhall within the ſpace of thirtie dayes after the publication heereof, depart out of all our Realmes and Dominions of SPAINE, with their wiues, children, ſeruants, and others of their nation: and that they ſhall not preſume to returne nor to make any reſidence in them, in any ſort whatſoeuer. And wee forbid them to depart by the Realmes of VALEN-CIA, or ARAGON, nor to enter into them, nor to ſtay in any of our Realmes or Countries after the time prefixed, vpon paine of death, and confiſcation of all their goods. And wee commaund, that no perſon within our Realmes and Seigniories of what eſtate, qualities, or condition ſoeuer, ſhall preſume to receiue, conceale, or defend publikely nor ſecretly any Moriſque man or woman, after the ſaid tearme, vpon paine to looſe all their goods, vaſſalls, forts, and lands; and moreouer to looſe all the graces, and benefits which they haue from me, M to bee applied to my exchequer.

And though I may iuſtly confiſcate all the goods moueable and vnmoueable of the ſaid Moriſques, as belonging to traitors, and guiltie of high treaſon, yet vſing clemencie, I am content

A content, that during the ſaid tearme of thirtie dayes, they may diſpoſe of their mooueable goods, and carrie them away, not in golde, ſiluer, iewels, nor letters of exchange, but in merchandize, which is not prohibited, bought of the naturall ſubiects of this realme, and not of others, or in the commodities of the ſaid countrey. And to the end they may during the time of thirtie dayes diſpoſe thereof, and of their mooueable goods, and imploy it in merchandiſe, or in the commodities of the countrey, and tranſport what they ſhall buy (for as for their lands, that muſt bee annexed to my reuenues, to bee imployed in the ſeruice of God and the common weale, as I ſhall thinke moſt fit.) I declare by theſe preſents, that I take them into my royall protection, and aſſure them and their goods, that during
B the ſaid time they may goe and come, to ſell, exchaunge, and alienate all their mooueable goods, and to imploy their money, golde, ſiluer, and iewells in merchandize not prohibited, or in the commodities of the countrey, and to tranſport the ſame freely, without any let or interruption, by land or by ſea, paying vſuall cuſtomes; ſo as they carrie no gold or ſiluer coyned, or to coyne, nor any other thing prohibited by the lawes of my realme. Yet we are content, they ſhall carrie ſo much money as ſhalbe needfull for their paſſage by land, and imbarking by ſea: commaunding all our officers and louing ſubiects to ſee this preſent edict duely obſerued &c. ſigned. I the King.

After the publication of this Edict, the tearme of thirtie dayes was reſtrained to twentie, ſo as the Moriſques were haſtened to depart: and the ſhippes and veſſels of what
C countrey ſoeuer, were ſtaied in all the ports of SPAINE, to tranſport them whither they would goe. Many paſſed from SPAINE into BARBARIE: But during this yeare there came aboue 150000 of theſe Moriſques into FRANCE, the king ſending commiſſaries, to ſee them well vſed, and orderly tranſported away.

There was a warre fallen out in BARBARIE betwixt Muley Xequy, king of FEZ, and Muley Sidan his younger brother, both Mahometanes, in which warre the younger forced the elder to flie his countrey, and to come and craue ayd from Philip king of SPAINE: But the vnfortunate loſſe of Don Sebaſtian king of PORTVGALL, was a good preſident for the Spaniard not to truſt in barbarous Kings without good aſſurance: Hee treated with the Barbarian, and promiſed him ſuccours, with 100000 duckats to re-D turne to ALARACHE, (a place which held for him) where by money or other practiſes, hee ſhould drawe vnto him as many ſouldiours as hee could: And that for the faſetie of the ſuccourrs that hee ſhould giue him, hee ſhould put ALARACHE or ARRACHE into his handes. This ARRACHE is a ſtrong towne in the Realme of FEZ, in the prouince of ALGAR, ſeated vpon the Ocean, at the mouth of the riuer of Lucus, whereon part of it is built, and the other vpon the Ocean: It hath a goodly Port, and hard to take, for that it is defended by a Fort, in the which the kings of FEZ doe vſually entertaine a garriſon of three hundred light horſe, and three hundred harquebuſiers: for that the Portugalls and Caſtillians, holde in a manner all the Sea townes of the prouinces of HABAT, and E ERIF, where they haue great garriſons. This prouince is from the riuer of Nocor along the Mediterranean Sea, vnto the ſtraight of Gibralter, the other is vpon the Ocean from the ſaid ſtraight vnto the riuer Lucus, in the which the King of SPAINE holdes at this day the ſtrong townes of TANGER, ARZILLA, and others. According to the former accord, the Barbarian returned to ARRACHE, with his money in one of the King of SPAINE his ſhippes, to whome in a ſhort time repaired many of his friends and ſeruants. The Spaniard in the meane time hauing prepared a fleet of a great number of gallies and ſhippes, and embarked tenne thouſand ſouldiours therein, hee gaue the commaund thereof vnto Marqueſſe of Saint Germaine, who arriued on the twentieth of Nouember in the euening at the port of ARRACHE, and there rode at anchor all the night. The next day in the morning the Marqueſſe calling all the Captaines to a coun-
F ſell, imparting vnto them his deſigne for to force ARRACHE, in caſe that the Mooriſh King did not keepe his promiſe: they gaue him aſſurance, that they would carrie themſelues like vnto braue and valiant ſouldiours. But ſee what happened: The king of FEZ hauing no meanes to goe from his word, ſeeing the Spaniard ſo ſtrong as hee might well force it, many of his followers and people, fearing to fall vnder the power of SPAINE, they would haue abandoned him; but hauing the Gouernour of the caſtle at his deuotion, hee thruſt out the garriſon, and deliuered the keyes himſelfe vnto the Marqueſſe of S. Germaine. G Vpon the firſt bruite that the Spaniards were entred into the caſtle, all the inhabitants ranne to armes, and thinking to reſiſt them, after that many of them had ended their dayes valiantly, during three houres combate, they were forced to yeeld vnto the Marqueſſe, who preſently planted the Croſſe and armes of CASTILE vpon all the towers and ſteeples. Thus this ſtrong towne which the Caſtillians and Portugals, had ſo long deſired, and whereas the inhabitants receiued a great ruine, is in the end fallen vnder the domination of their King. The newes of this exploit being brought into SPAINE, pleaſed the king much, and the people made bonefires for ioy. Theſe are the alterations of times. The Moores in old time were wont to ouerrunne SPAINE, and now the Spaniards take their pleaſures in MAVRITANIA.

Arrache in Barbarie taken by the Spaniards.

About the end of this yeare newes came to CONSTANTINOPLE, of the great warres H which had been betweene the Vncle and the Nephew, by the death of the great Cham of the Tartars: The ſonne, who during his fathers life time, had continued at CONSTANTINOPLE as an hoſtage, and was now ſent backe into his countrey by the Sultan Achmat, thinking to enioy his fathers eſtate; his vncle, brother to the deceaſed Cham, practized to ſeize vpon the crowne: but either of them hauing drawne an armie of 60000 men together, in the end they ioyned battell, whereas after the ſlaughter of 40000 men vpon the place, the ſonne had the victorie, and by that meanes obtained the crowne of TARTARIA.

I will conclude this yeare 1610, with the relation of a particular buſineſſe, to ſhew the greedie deſire of the Turks to get by any vniuſt meanes whatſoeuer, and their infidelitie and falſhood to ſay and ſweare any thing for bribes. Some yeres before one maſter Willoughbie an I Engliſh Gentleman, hauing rigged out a ſhip for war into the Leuant, he came in to ALGIER in BARBARIE, to ſel his prize, where at that time one Solyman Catania was Baſſa. This ſhip was ſuddenly ſeazed on, and rifled, by the command of this Baſſa, vpon no other ſubiect, but that the Baſſa pretended this ſhip had burnt a Carra mouſall of his, which in truth the Baſſa himſelfe had cauſed to be ſet on fire, that vnder colour thereof hee might ſeize vpon the ſhip and goods. Maſter Willoughby went to CONSTANTINOPLE, and there made his complaint to Sir Henrie Lilloe, then embaſſadour for the Engliſh, but yet could get no ſatisfaction: Whereupon he returned into England, and obtained letters from his Maieſtie to the Grand Seignior, and to Sir Thomas Glouer, then embaſſadour reſiding at CONSTANTINOPLE, which hauing K receiued, hee went preſently to the Chimacham (who was lieutenant to Murath Baſſa the grand Viſier, he being then imploied in the warres againſt the Perſian.) The Chimacham hauing read theſe letters, would not ſuffer them to bee deliuered to the Grand Seignior, promiſing to doe iuſtice vpon Solyman Catania, whom hee diſcharged from his place, and ſent for him to CONSTANTINOPLE; who being come, and called in queſtion, hee denied the fact: Maſter Willoughbie (hauing no certaine proofe of his loſſe) ſuborned one Oſiſh Baſſa a Turke, who had been at MECHA, and was therefore held a verie holy man, who ſet a brother of his to procure falſe witneſſes, vpon promiſe to haue the tenth part of what ſhould be recouered: The witneſſes being readie to ſweare to his aſſertion, Solyman Catania hearing their oath, compounded with maſter Willoughbie, and gaue him foure or fiue thouſand dollars: ſo the buſineſſe ended. Which ſhowes the corruption of the Turks, and that the holieſt of them L for money will not ſticke to beare falſe witneſſe, and take falſe oathes.

This yeare 1611 the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE was wonderfully afflicted with the plague, the which diſperſt it ſelfe ouer all, and crept into the graund Seigniors Seraglio, whereas one of his ſonnes died of that infection, whereupon the Graund Seigniour was forced to retire for his ſafetie, and to paſſe the remainder of the ſummer in his pallace or Seraglio of Darut Baſſa, about a league and a halfe diſtant from the citie, this violent contagion did ſo rage in CONSTANTINOPLE for the ſpace of fiue moneths, as there were numbred 200000 perſons dead within the time, and they did commonly carrie euerie day twelue or fifteene hundred bodies to be buried. The greatneſſe of this mortalitie is not to bee imputed ſo much to the corruption of the aire, as to the wilfull negligence of the Turkes, who would not vouchſafe M to turne away from a bodie dead of this diſeaſe, when it goes to buriall, nor to forbeare to viſite their friends being infected. The obſtinate beliefe they haue of predeſtination makes them bruitiſhly contemne all ſorts of dangers: for ſay they, as ſoone as man comes out of his mothers wombe to enioy the light of the world, God writes in his forehead all the good or

A or euill ſhall happen vnto him, and particularly of what death hee ſhall die, the neceſſitie whereof no humane power can auoid. All is gouerned (ſay they) by deſtinie, and therefore they regard not any infection, but contrariwiſe when any one is dead, another takes his clothes, and weares them: which is the cauſe that CONSTANTINOPLE, and the grand CAIRE are ſeldom free; and when as the aire is any thing diſpoſed to contagion, there dies ſuch multitudes of people, as they doe not number them, but by hundred thouſands.

Before the beginning of this plague, the Baron of SALIONAC Embaſſador for the French king at CONSTANTINOPLE, ended his embaſſage with his life. His moſt Chriſtian maieſtie ſent the Baron of MOLE, eldeſt ſonne to the Baron of SANSIE to ſupply his place: he arriued
B at PERA this yeare in the beginning of September, and about the ende of October the Sultan being returned to CONSTANTINOPLE, after that hee had viſited the Muphti, who is the chiefe of their law; the graund Viſier, the Deſtorda, who is the Sultans high Treaſurer, the Boſtangi Baſſa his chiefe Gardiner, with other great men of the Port, which were highly in fauour: in the end hee was admitted to audience, and to kiſſe the Sultans hand. A ceremonie which in mine opinion I owe vnto the hiſtorie, to ſhew that the maieſtie of the Turkiſh Emperours is ſo great, as to approach neere vnto them, the embaſſadors of forreine princes as forced to diſguiſe themſelues, and leauing the habits of their nation, to attire themſelues and their traine after the Turkiſh manner. Thus the embaſſadour of FRANCE parted from his lodging at PERA, wearing vpon his French apparell, a long Turkiſh robe of cloath of
C gold curld, furred with ſables: his gentlemen and ſecretaries, to the number of ſixteene, had the like robes, but of meaner ſtuffe, wearing caps of black veluet: he had 20 ſeruants in long caſſocks of ſcarlet called in Turkiſh, Ferrages, and vpon them long robes of the ſame ſtuffe, with caps of blacke taffetie, the foure Dragomans, or the kings interpreters, the captaines, maſters of ſhips, and other Frenchmen attended all in long robes, accompanied the traine; he paſt the channell which doth ſeparate PERA from CONSTANTINOPLE, being come to the other ſide, he found many goodly horſes for him and his traine, which ſome Turks that were friends to FRANCE had ſent him to conduct him to the citie, at the gate whereof many Chiaus and Ianizaries attended him to conduct him to the Seraglio, two Chiaus Baſſaes went of either ſide him, accompanying him thither, the reſt of the Turkes going before. His arriuall
D was no leſſe honourable at the pallace royall, than his comming to the towne: two Capigi Baſſaes, or chiefe of the Porters, receiued him at the entrie of a great court, and conducted him to the graund Viſier, who attended him at dinner in the hall, where he was feaſted, being accompanied onely with one Dragoman or interpreter: the reſt of his traine were conducted into a low gallerie, whereas dinner was prepared for them after the Turkiſh manner: That is to ſay, a great tapiſtrie vpon the ground without cloth or napkins, and ſome diſhes thinne ſet. The meat was watergruell with ſugar, and ſome pottage with pullets: there were two men either of them holding a certaine inſtrument of ſodden leather, in which there was a beuerage which they call Cerbet, made of the iuice of lymons water and ſugar, and withall they held a cup of blancht copper, giuing to euerie one drink, & going among the diſhes
E to ſerue them more commodiouſly. From this feaſt diſtaſtfull to them that had liued after the French faſhion, they paſt into another gallerie, whereas the Embaſſador and 16 of his companie, receiued each of them a robe of tinſell, the which hauing put on vpon their other, they were conducted through a little court paued with marble, towards the Graund Seigniours chamber, which was enricht on the outſide with many pillars of marble, and ſquare ſtones of the ſame ſtuffe, and beautified with two little fountaines of either ſide: The chamber within was about ten paces ſquare, the planchard was guilt, the wals enameled with flowers after the Turkiſh manner, and the floore couered with Tapiſtrie of gold and ſilke. At the entrie of this Imperiall chamber, ſtood ſixe Capigi or Porters, whereof two of them tooke the embaſſador vnder the armes, and led him to kiſſe the Sultans hand, or rather his robe, for F hauing ſaluted him from the greateſt of Chriſtian kings, hee kiſt but his robe, and then was led on the one ſide going backwards, to the end he ſhould not turne his backe to the Emperour. The French gentlemen were conducted after the like manner to kiſſe his robe: But they could hardly ſee the Sultan; for his face was turned towards a window that was grated, before the which during the ceremonie there paſt thirtie Capigi, euerie one carrying a peece of the preſents which the embaſſadour had brought, during the which, the Frencemen could Troubles in Transyluania.

This past at CONSTANTINOPLE, whereas the Sultan did willingly see an Embassador his allie, whom he honoured aboue all others. But in TRANSYLVANIA the affaires went after another straine; the combustions which seemed inseparable to this miserable prouince, made it still the theater of all disorders. Gabriell Battori who gouerned it since the cession of Ragotzi, had put himselfe into the Turkes protection, against King Matthias, who pretended a title, by reason of the cession made by prince Sigismund vnto the Emperor, as king of HVNGARIE, and had recouered HERMSTAD, and chased Raduille Vayuod of VALACHIA out of his countrey, where hauing setled a new Gouernour, and filled the garrisons with Haiduckes, he returned toward TRANSYLVANIA, to oppose himselfe against Fortgatsi king Matthias his lieutenant, who came with troups out of high HVNGARIE, and past the riuer of Tibisce. The Vayuod Raduille had retired himselfe into MOLDAVIA to prince Constantine, whom hee gaue to vnderstand, that Battori had an intent to seaze vpon his countrey, and to make but one monarchie of their three prouinces; whereupon they ioyned their forces together, and in the end of Iune entred into VALACHIA, from whence they expelled Battori his lieutenant, with all the garrisons. This exploit made them to hope of a continuance in the prosperitie of their armes; they entred into TRANSYLVANIA, whereas they pursued Battori with such diligence, as they forced him to come to a battell neere vnto CROMSTAR, the which hee lost with part of his troupes, being constrained to saue himselfe with his horsmen in HERMSTAD, whereas some of the chiefe inhabitants seeing him receiue this disgrace, attempted to submit themselues vnder the obedience of king Matthias: but the practise being discouered by him, hee did such execution, as he purchased to himselfe the name of cruell. H I

Battori defeated by the Valachian.

Fortgatsi lieutenant to king Matthias enters Transyluania.

In the meane time Fortgatsi lieutenant to king Matthias, makes vse of this defeat to seaze vpon TRANSYLVANIA; hee made an accord with Andrew Nage (who had drawen high HVNGARIE into rebellion, and caused the Haiduckes to reuolt) so as being freed from that feare, he enters into TRANSYLVANIA, where hauing taken some townes and castles, he laid siege to CLAVSENBVRG, the which hee battered so furiously, as the garrison and inhabitants seeing themselues readie to be forced, yeelded, and tooke the oath of alleageance to king Matthias the fiue and twentieth of Iuly. But as these prosperities of Fortgatsi were humane, so did they not long continue. Battori being shut vp in HERMSTAD, coniures all his friends to come vnto him, and intreated the Bassaes of BVDA and TEMESVVAR, to succour him, according to the commaundement which they had receiued from the graund Seignior: he practised with Nage (a man which did swimme continually in the flotes of inconstancie) and makes him to reuolt againe in high HVNGARIE, vpon a surmise that Fortgatsi had not kept promise with him, so as Nage tooke armes againe, seized vpon the fort of BAYENS, and filled all high HVNGARIE with combustions, so as Fortgatsi could expect no succours at his need from thence: then hauing receiued some forces from the Turkes and Tartarians, he went to field, pursuing Fortgatsi with such heat and furie, as he forced him to abandon all that he had taken in TRANSILVANIA, and to retire into VALACHIA. What desolations did this warre bring vnto these prouinces by so many prises and reprises? Battori going with a thousand horse to surprise TOCAI, vpon the frontiers of VALACHIA, whereas they then held a great faire, hee found the garrison so watchfull vpon their guard, as hauing lost part of his horsemen, hee was forced to returne into TRANSYLVANIA. On the other side Fortgatsi with his Hungarians, thinking from VALACHIA to recouer high HVNGARIE, by the countrey of the Zeclerians could not effect his designe: for Battori being aduertised thereof, stopped his passage, and in like manner the Earles of Bucheim and Dampier had past the riuer of Tibisce to meet him; so as Battori set such guardes in all the passages and straights, that Fortgatsi was forced to retire towards POLONIA by the steepe mountaines, and desert places, whereas his armie was so oppresst with famine, and all other necessities, as they perished miserably, there remaining few aliue, with the which he ended his passage into POLONIA, and from thence soone after hee returned into HVNGARIE, but with a very poore equipage. M

Thus the storme ceasing in TRANSYLVANIA, by the restraint of Forgatsi, a more violent tempest

A tempeſt riſeth in MOLDAVIA, to the end that theſe vnfortunate regions ſhould neuer be without ſome touch of miſerie: For the Turke hauing vnderſtood, that Conſtantine prince of that countrey had relieued the Valachian againſt Battori his allie, or rather his tributarie, hee ſends a new prince into MOLDAVIA, the ſuppoſed ſonne of one Thomas, or Aaron as ſome write, who had in former time commanded there, and with him fifteene hundred ſouldiors, with letters of commaund to the Turkes and Tartarians thereabouts, to aſſiſt him with their forces. This new prince was ſometime in FRANCE, and afterwards detained priſoner in the fort of Iaques in SPAINE, within the Pirenean mountaines. Thus two princes contend for MOLDAVIA, the one ſupported by the Polonian, and the other by the Turke. But behold, a B third prince comes in and pretends a title, being ſonne to one Ianicolo, who had commanded there. This man had been a priſoner in the blacke tower at CONSTANTINOPLE, to which he was committed by the Sultan Amurath, for that hee had loſt a battell in the yeare 1601, againſt Michaell who then poſſeſt MOLDAVIA, who eſcaping from thence, wandered through diuers countries, and at laſt comming into ENGLAND, his Maieſtie of great BRITAINE pitying his miſerable eſtate, recommended him by his letters to Sir Thomas Glouer, his Maieſties Embaſſadour, then reſiding at CONSTANTINOPLE, with commandement to aſſiſt him, and to ſollicite his reſtitution with the Graund Seignior. Vpon the receipt of which letters, hee retired this wandring prince into his houſe at PERA, where hee entertained him, with many of his friends and followers which repaired vnto him for a long time; and in the meane time he ſo- C licited the graund Seignior for his reſtitution, hauing good acceſſe vnto him, by reaſon that he ſpake the Turkiſh tongue perfectly, and needed no Dragoman or Interpreter: to whom the Sultan ſtill gaue good anſwers, but with delayes, that it was not yet time, but hee ſhould haue ſatisfaction. His competitor (who was in poſſeſſion of MOLDAVIA) hearing of this practiſe, made friends at the great Turks court, and corrupted ſome of the Baſſaes by bribes, (they being all by nature verie couetous) to the end hee might croſſe his deſigne, and make him away if it were poſſible: and among the reſt he had wonne Murath Baſſa the grand Viſier, a man of great power and authoritie, who practiſed many meanes to get the Moldauian into his hands. Firſt, he ſent word vnto the Embaſſadour, that the Sultan hauing a meaning to reſtore him, deſired to ſee the man, if hee were capable of the place or no: but being ad- D uertiſed of their intent, and well acquainted with their practiſes, he refuſed to ſend him; after which he wrote vnto him, that it was the Graund ſeigniors pleaſure, he ſhould ſend the Moldauian vnto him, that he might conferre with him. To whom the Embaſſador made anſwer, that vnleſſe he might ſee a warrant vnder the grand Seigniors owne hand, he would not deliuer him. Murath Baſſa ſeeing that none of theſe practiſes could preuaile, reſolued to fetch him out by force. For the effecting whereof, he drew together two thouſand Ianizaries. The Embaſſadour hearing of his intent, fortified his houſe, and armed his people with the Moldauians which were with their prince, meaning to ſtand vpon his defence. Murath Baſſa deſirous to know what the Embaſſadour did in his lodging, diſguiſed a Ianizarie like vnto a Greekiſh ſheepheard, who entring into the Embaſſadours houſe, found them all in armes: E then returning vnto the Baſſa, he told him, that he had to doe with a mad man, and if he proceeded in his enterpriſe, he would hazard the loſſe of many Ianizaries: whereupon he gaue it ouer. After which the Embaſſador being called home into ENGLAND, the Moldauian deſpairing of reſtitution from the Sultan, hee turned Turke; and being preſented to the graund Seignior, was made Bey of BVASIA in ASIA, the which hee enioyed not long; for Naſſaf comming from the Perſian warres, diſcharged him. Thus MOLDAVIA hauing many preten- ding ſoueraignes, ſuffered many miſeries, and was a prey to Turke, Tartarians, and Polonians, all partiſans to theſe ſoueraignes.

Troubles in Moldauia.

Three princes pretending to Moldauia.

The negotiation of the Embaſſador of England for one of the princes of Moldauia.

These were the troubles which the Turke cauſed at land for the ruine of Chriſtians. But behold what he ſuffered at ſea by the gallies of FLORENCE, MALTA, and NAPLES; the Flo- F rentines made their enterpriſe apart. The great duke of TVSCANIE being aduertiſed that the Carauan, which tranſported the tribute of AEGYPT to CONSTANTINOPLE, prepared to put to ſea, he reſolued to diuert this tribute, and by the valour of his armes to bring it to LIGORNE: and for the effecting hereof, he ſpeedily armed foure gallions, vnder the command of Beauregard a Frenchman, who was Admirall. The firſt was called the new gallion, in which the ſaid Admirall went: the ſecond the great Ligorne, commaunded by Brandequedor, dor, Generall at land, and allied to the Duke; and the other two were commaunded by two French captaines. Beauregard hauing receiued commaundement, to paſſe with this fleet into the Leuant, to meet with the Carauan, he bent his courſe towards CANDIE, a fertile iſland inhabited by the Grecians: Being arriued in the port of CALISMENE to water, he continued there ſixe daies. Leauing this Iſland, he ſailed towards CYPRVS, which is held by the Turks, and ſo coaſting SIRIA, they learned of a ſhip of MARSEILLES, that the Carauan was yet in the port of ALEXANDRIA, where they prepared for their voyage to CONSTANTINOPLE. To attend them, the Admirall Beauregard, went and caſt anchor at the fort of SIDON, called SAREPTA, gouerned by Emir, or Armill Facardin, a rebell to the Turke, and a great friend to the Florentines, where he ſtaied twelue dayes, to take in Bisket, fleſh, and other neceſſarie refreſhings. And hauing made a more ſtrict league of friendſhip with Facardin, hee honoured him with a cofer full of armes, whereby the Florentines ſhippes came as freely into thoſe parts, as into their owne countrey.

The enterpriſe to take the Caravan of Egypt

Beauregard hauing well victualled and munitioned his gallions, hee returned towards the Iſle of CYPRVS, whereas hee found a Chriſtians ſhip called the Flying Dragon, which came from DAMIETTA, by whom he was aſſured that the Turks armie, conſiſting of a great number of gallies, was gone out of the port of RHODES, and had taken a Flemiſh ſhip. Theſe newes made him thinke that he ſhould meet the fleet, and that hee muſt of force defend himſelfe. Wherefore hee made all things readie, and preſcribed the order which his captaines ſhould hold during the fight, cauſing his ordinance to be mounted as if they were to ioyne. Hee had foure as good gallions, and as well furniſhed, as any were in the Leuant ſeas, either of them being armed with fortie pieces of ordinance, and 400 good ſouldiors. Betwixt the Iſland of CYPRVS and CARAMANIA they incountred this Turkiſh fleet conſiſting of fortie gallies, and two galliaſſes, vnder the commaund of Baſſa Muſtapha Grego, who was Generall of this fleet, which was in ſight of the Florentines ſhips: the galliaſſes aduance to take view of them, and to finde how farre their cannon would reach; and in the meane time the gallies put themſelues into the forme of a Croiſſant, readie for the combat. Beauregard an old ſea captaine, and well practiſed in ſea fights, would not make a ſhot againſt the gallies, but attended vntill the whole fleet came cloſe vp to him, which being neere, he ſaluted them ſo furiouſly with his cannon, giuing them the broad ſides, as the Turkes (who expected no ſuch reception) were all amazed, and making a ſtand, would proceed no further. Their Generall hauing well obſerued the reſolute countenance of the Florentines, diuided his gallies into two ſquadrons, giuing charge to the one to giue an aſſault to the Florentines gallions; and in the meane time the reſt ſhould prepare themſelues to fight.

The Florentines meet with the Turkes fleet.

The Turkes aſſaile the gallions of Florence.

Being thus diuided, they came one after another to the aſſault, the which continued for the ſpace of ſixe houres, and yet could not board them. Muſtapha ſeeing fiue of his gallies ſunke by the enemies cannon, with the loſſe of all the men that were within them; but ſuddenly the wind changed, and proued fauourable to the Florentines, who imbraced this aduantage, giuing chaſe to the Turkes gallies, forcing them to ſeeke their ſafetie in the hauen of FAMAGVSTA, the chiefe fort of CYPRVS; ſo of aſſailants (being beaten) they became runne awaies: ſo inconſtant are the accidents of warre; and eſpecially at ſea, wheras the good or bad ſucceſſe many times dependeth of a little wind.

The Turkes put to flight.

This Turkiſh fleet, hauing loſt fiue gallies, and recouered a Port in CYPRVS, the Admirall Beauregard, ſeeing his deſigne againſt the Carauan diſappointed, hee reſolued to returne towards LIGORNE with his Gallions: being at ſea, hee incountred a Turkiſh veſſell called a Caramouſall, which came from RAODES to goe vnto CYPRVS: they chaſed it, and in the end ouertooke it, which they preſt ſo with their ordinance, as they ſlew 130 Turkes, and tooke 300 ſlaues. The bootie was verie rich, being valued at 140000 crownes. After this prize, their victuals beginning to faile, hauing beene ſo long at ſea, they bent their courſe for LIGORNE: but the wind falling contrary, the were forced to ſtay eight dayes in the Iſland of SCARPANTE, paſt the bar of MESSINA, and hauing giuen chaſe to certaine gallies of TVNES, they arriued at LIGORNE the fifteenth of Iune, where there was great ioy for their returne, and the prize which they had brought, the which according to the cuſtome was to bee diuided; one third to the ſouldiors and marriners, and the other two parts imploied for the entertainment of the ſhips, and the paiment of the captaines.

The Florentines take a rich ſhip of the Turkes.

This

A This Carauan which goes from Egypt to Constantinople, is euery yeare attended for, not onely by the gallions and gallies of Florence, but by those of Malta and Naples; and by all the pirats of the Mediterranean sea; like vnto the English and Hollanders, who yearely lay in wait for the Indian fleet, before the conclusion of the peace and truce with the Spaniard. And although their principall designe was to take some part of this Carauan, yet they had other enterprises vpon the Turkes countrie, besides the spoile of merchants which they met by chance, which many times paid the charge of their voiage: and sometimes they that thought to take were taken, and lost both their ships and liues.

The exploits of the gallies of Malta and Naples.

B The gallies of Malta, commanded by the Bailife of Venouge, and those of Naples by the Marquis of S. Croix ioyned together soon after, with a designe to set vpon the carauan, which caried the reuenue and tribute of Egypt to Constantinople, or else to put in execution the enterprise which they had long before proiected, vpon certaine places in Albania, or to surprise or spoile some island in the Archipelague, which might pay their charges: but the first failing, they met with a Venetian ship laden with merchādise, to the value of 100000 crowns.

A Venetian ship taken

The Spaniards who commanded in the gallies of Naples, seized vpon this ship, but the Generall of Malta would by no meanes consent vnto it, nor suffer any of the merchandize to be put into his gallies, for that he would not vniustly violat the friendship which was betwixt his order and the state of Venice. This example did touch the Spaniards consciences, so as within few daies they sent away the Venetian ship, but in courtesie they had vnloaden all the

C merchandise.

The Christians gallies go to the island of Lango

After this prey of a Christian ship, the fleet discouered two sailes at sea, sending presently after them, they were two barks, the one comming from Candie loaden with wood, and the other from Scarpanta charged with wine, the which being brought vnto the Generals, gaue them to vnderstand, that the carauan of Egypt was not yet past, being aduertised that 50 christians gallies attended them in their passage. Vpon this aduice the Christian Generals being out of hope to surprise the carauan, presently resolued to vndertake a more great and glorious enterprise, and to surprise the island and castle of Lango, in the Archipelague, vpon the coast of Natolia, and about seuen of the clocke at night they set saile with a good wind, but being changed in the morning, they were forced to returne to the Island of Porchere,

D from whence they parted againe at eight of the clock at night, and continuing their course in the morning they discouered three Florentine ships, who told them that they had entred into the Isle of Nigropont with seuen gallies; but hauing been discouered, they could not effect any thing, and that their gallies were separated from them in the chase of foure galliots. The Christian fleet continuing their course, they arriued about 11 of the clocke in the morning, at S. Iean de Seruae, where hauing cast anchor, there was a counsel called in the Admiral, where they resolued to petarde the castle of Lango, toward the sea: for the execution wherof they should land 200 men; that is to say, 30 knights, and 50 souldiors, out of the gallies of Malta, and 120 Spaniards out of the gallies of Naples, and that they should carrie two petardes with them, the one giuen in charge to captain Beaulaigue, in the troupe of them of Mal-

E ta, & the other was cdūcted by the Spaniards; the rest of their men which they should land, should go and assault the towne of Lango. With this resolution they parted from S. Iean de Seruae, with a good wind, and arriued at the island of Lango on the sixt of Iune, an houre after midnight, whereas they landed 3 miles from the towne: they that were appointed for the enterprise, marcht on with their petardes, according to direction; but the night being very dark, the troupe of Malta straied from their guide, but their valour brought them directly to the wals of the towne, where after many turnings and windings, to finde a fit place to plant the petard, (notwithstanding that they were discouered and much shot at) Beaulague set it to a port next the sea, well flankt by the castle, the which hee forced, and his men entring with furie, went from street to street, and put all to the sword that made resistance. The Spa-

Lango forced by the christians

F niards on the other side, made another breach with their petarde, and entred the towne; notwithstanding, that at their first approach, the Turkes (hauing discouered them) played vpon them with their great ordnance and small shot: the troups being ioyned together, hauing cut all the Turkes in pieces they met with, they came to the place before the castle, which they thought to surprise: but the bridge was drawen, and they lay open at the mercie of their shot; so as there were fifteene knights of Malta hurt, one slaine, with a Spanish captaine,

captaine, and ſome ſixe and thirtie ſouldiors of the gallies of NAPLES, and as many wounded. Day being come, the Bailife of VENOVCE, Generall of the gallies of MALTA, came vnto the towne with the foreward, wherein were 150 knights, and 450 ſouldiors, the Marqueſſe of Saint Croix followed him with the two ſonnes of the Viceroy of NAPLES, and 1500 Spaniards, who ſpoiled the towne and ſuburbs, and tooke all that were liuing captiue: But the caſtle being well fortified, they found it impoſſible to force; wherupon imbarking their men and ſpoile, they reſolued in their returne to MALTA and NAPLES, to make an enterpriſe vpon ſome townes of ALBANIA, but vpon the way they were aduertiſed, that the Turkes had diſcouered the intelligence which the Spaniards and knights of MALTA had with the Grecians of the countrey; whereupon they tooke reuenge vpon them, putting many of them to death, and amongſt others a Patriarch, who (being accuſed to haue practiſed the Chriſtians reuolt againſt the Turks) was cruelly fleied aliue, and his skinne ſent to CONSTANTINOPLE: ſo dangerous a thing it is to ſeeke for libertie with this Mahometan nation.

An enterpriſe vpon Albania diſcouered by the Turks

A Patriarch of Greece fleyed aliue.

The Carauan of ÆGYPT was ſtill in the port of ALEXANDRIA, attending a paſſage, and to be freed from ſo many Chriſtian gallies which lay in wait for it; and it ſtayed the longer by reaſon of the great plague, wherewith CONSTANTINOPLE was afflicted. But in the end of October, Mechmet Baſſa of CAIRE (who would conduct it in perſon) hauing a conuoy of fiftie gallies well armed, put to ſea, and arriued at CONSTANTINOPLE without any encounter: At his landing, this Baſſa cauſed to march before him 60 mules, euery one laden with 20000 Sequins in kind, being a whole yeares tribute of the kingdome of EGYPT, the which he cauſed to bee carried to the Sultans Serail. This money was welcome to the Port: For the former warres both in HVNGARIE, TRANSYLVANIA, in ASIA againſt the rebels, and in PERSIA, had ſo waſted the Emperours treaſure, as it would hardly intertaine one of his armies. The Baſſa who had gathered this tribute together faithfully, and with great diligence, was at his comming to the Sultans Port, honoured with the charge of Baſſa of the ſea (hee who had it before being aduaunced to the dignitie of Viſier) and moreouer the Sultan promiſed him his daughter in marriage, being but three yeares old.

The Carauan of Egypt arriues at Conſtãtinople

The Baſſaes recompence that brought it.

Newes came to the Port, that certaine ſhips, gallies, and galleaſſes of the Chriſtians, to the number of fiftie, came neere vnto the Helleſpont, which put the Turkes in great feare, and complaints being brought vnto the Graund Seigniour, that certaine Caramouſalls had been taken by the Chriſtian gallies. He ſent preſently for the Captaine Baſſa or Admirall of the ſea, demaunding of him, whether the report of theſe loſſes were true or no? To whom he anſwered yes. Why are not you then at ſea, ſaith hee? Hee anſwered, For that I can get neither men nor money. Whereupon the Deftardar or Treaſurer was ſent for, who had loſt his head, had not the Aga of the grand Seigniors women intreated for him.

The Turkes are in feare of the Chriſtians gallies.

This Summer CONSTANTINOPLE and the countrey thereabouts, was ſo plagued with ſuch clouds of graſhoppers, as they did ſhadow the verie ſunne beames, and fell vpon the citie and countrey round about. The Turkes conſulted with their wiſemen, what it might portend: who anſwered, That they did foreſhew great plentie to follow: but indeed they left not a greene hearbe nor a leafe in all the countrey adioyning, nor in the citie, where they entred into their very chambers, and annoyed them much, being almoſt as bigge as dormiſe with red wings. And ſoone after there fell ſuch extraordinarie great haile in CONSTANTINOPLE, & GALLATA, with ſuch abundance of raine, as the violence of the water did ſuddenly ſhut vp one of the gates of the citie, and ſo rebounding filled their ſhops and houſes, that very many were in great danger of drowning. Some houſes fell downe; and ſome people were ſlaine, the pauements of the ſtreetes were torne vp, and the ſtones carried together into great heapes.

Graſhopers at Conſtantinople ſpoile the countrey.

Violent raine in the citie.

Wee haue formerly made relation of the Perſians victories, and of the defeat and death of Cicala Generall of the Turkes armie, in the yeare 1605. And that the yeare following the Sophie hauing recouered whatſoeuer the Turks had taken from his predeceſſors, had extended the bounds of his Empire vnto the backe ſea, from whence he ſent an Embaſſador vnto the Graund Seignior, to let him vnderſtand, that hauing recouered what had beene vniuſtly vſurped from him, he would proceed no further, but deſired to liue in peace, the which might now bee the better aſſured, the one holding nothing from the other. Moreouer, this Perſian Embaſſadour hauing remained ſeuen moneths at the Sultans port, was in the end forced to retire

A retire into PERSIA without audience. And lastly, that Amurath Serder the graund Visier, was afterwards forced to conuert his armes against Gambolat and the rebels of ASIA, and to neglect the warre of PERSIA.

Notwithstanding the Persian warre, there arriued this yeare at CONSTANTINOPLE, an Embassador from PERSIA, who according to the Turks manner, was attended on by a great troup of Chaoux on horsebacke, Capigis, Ianizaries and their captaines, sent by the Sultan to conduct him to his lodging. Within few dayes after his arriuall, there was a great show made in CONSTANTINOPLE, by the seuerall trades of the citie, euery one marching by themselues before the graund Seigniors serraill, and representing vnto him their manner of marching in B the warres, and the order of their prouision; some carying on their shoulders sheepe, others lambes, calues, beefe, &c. All which was done of pollicie to daunt and dishearten the Persian Embassador, and to encourage their own people, and withall to let him know, that there should be as great plentie in their campes, as hee saw at that present. And to abuse him still with the imagination of their great preparation, the Chimacham or Visiers Lieutenant, sent the next day for this Persian Embassador, and during their conference had taken order that the Emperour of Tartarias brother (who was then in the Sultans court) should come in, at whose entrance the Chimacham arose from his place, Oh (saith he) I know for what you come, It is for money for your soudiours: you shall receiue it at such a place. Which words were heard by a Dragoman to the English Embassador being then present: the which was done to terrifie C the Persian embassador, and at the same time and to the same end they sent ouer diuers troups of soldiors to SCVDARET, as if they had bin ready to march with an armie.

A Persian Embassador comes to Constantinople

The Turkes great armies are not raised in haste, neither doe they march in post: when as the Spahis, that is to say, the horsemen, which make the greatest part of his armie, and haue no other pay or entertainement than the reuenues of certaine land, are discharged, they must haue a whole yeare to recouer their reuenue, and to put themselues in equipage; and moreouer, it is threescore dayes march for an armie, from CONSTANTINOPLE into PERSIA.

The Turks armie against the Persian.

Also in the yeare 1609 and 1610, the Turke had not attempted any thing against the Persian, who still solicited him for peace. The greatnesse of the Ottoman Empire, could not resolue to make a peace, hauing receiued so great defeats, they would giue it, but as victors, not as vanquished. But this yeare Achmat resolued to send a puissant armie of aboue 150000 D men, against this auntient enemie of his house, vnder the command of Amurath Serder his Graund Visier: But before the armie entred into PERSIA, it was without a commander, by the death of Serder, in the end of Iuly; so as they were forced to stay and attend the Sultans pleasure from CONSTANTINOPLE.

The death of Amurath Seder

It was suspected that hee had beene poysoned by Nassuf Bassa, one that stood out in rebellion against the Graund Seigniour, and yet hee had many friendes in the Turkes armie: Wherefore to preuent all mutinies, and consequently, the ouerthrowe of the whole armie, Amurath Bassa in his sickenesse aduised the Graund Seigniour (by letters which hee sent vnto him) to make Nassuf Generall of the whole armie, and so by faire meanes to drawe him home, and then to dispose of him at his pleasure. The Sultan E with his Bassaes approoued well of this aduice, and chose him Graund Visier, and Generall of the armie; who hauing receiued the Seale and Authoritie, did foorthwith put many of Amuraths friends to death, and with their money payed all the souldiors, which had wanted pay, whereof some had beene without fiue yeares before: hee also sent vnto the Graund Seigniour threescore and tenne mules loaden with money of Amuraths treasure, and threescore with goods, all which the Sultan gaue vnto Amuraths wife and children.

It is strange to read, how the Grand Seignior doth tyrannise ouer his subiects, and how seuerely he doth punish the least omission in any of his officers: for I finde it obserued, that the F 7 of Ianuary in the end of this yeare 1611, the grand seignior being abroad in the snow, and not well prouided for of fuell, he caused Stambol Aga who had that charge to be stript naked, and set in the snowe foure or fiue houres. Indeed this Winter was verie rigorous, and there fell aboundance of snowe throughout all Turkie, with great stormes, manie houses were beaten downe; and amongst other the French Consull at ALEPPO was slaine with the fall of his owne house.

Seueritie of the Sultan.

Naſsuf parted from Asia, and marched with his armie vnto to the frontiers of Persia, G where he committed ſuch ſpoiles, as the Sophie was conſtrained to draw all his forces together, to preuent the ruine of his countrey, being then about the midſt of Auguſt. But when they were come to a battell, the Perſian finding the partie vnequall for him, and dangerous, The Perſian offers conditions of peace and a tribute. offered conditions of peace, & promiſed to giue the Turke a quantitie of ſilke which ſhould make the charge of 200 cammels, for a yearely tribute, in acknowledgement of ſome countries which he had conquered from the Ottomans. Theſe offers were accepted at Constantinople; but there was added that the Perſians ſonne ſhould be called Baſſa of Tavris, and that the magiſtrat and iudge of that citie, called the Cady, ſhould bee ſent from Constantinople. We ſhall ſee in the following yere the effects of theſe propoſitions, by the Embaſſador of Persia, whom Naſſuf ſhall bring to Constantinople; in the meane time let vs return H to the Mediterranean ſea, to take a ſuruey of the valiant exploits of the knights of Malta a-gainſt the Turkes.

The falſhood of a Turke puniſhed by the iuſtice of God. On the 26 of April, a Turk hauing lent a good ſum of mony to a Chriſtian, to be paid at a certain day; he came before the appointed day with another Turk, & willed the chriſtian to pay the mony to that other Turk when the day came, which the chriſtian promiſed to do, & performed it accordingly: but the Turk denied the receit therof: wherupon he to whom the mony was properly due, came & demanded it, to whom the chriſtian anſwered, that he had paid it to that partie to whom he had aſſigned it: wherunto the Turk replied, that if it were ſo he was ſatisfied, but yet the other Turk denied it: wherupon the matter was broght before the Iudge, and the Turke who had receiued the mony, taking an oath to the contrary: the Chri- I ſtian according to the Turkiſh iuſtice, was inforced to pay the money againe: the which hee did, but withall hee praied God to ſhew ſome publike ſigne which of them had done the wrong. And thereupon the Turke going forth to repaire home to his houſe, fell downe dead in the ſtreet.

The great Maſter Vignancourt continuing his generous deſignes to ruine the Turke, had an enterpriſe againſt Navarrin, a place importing this common enemie of Chriſtians: for the execution whereof, he ſent the fiue gallies of his order, vnder the charge of Vaqueras, great commaunder of the order, and chiefe of the nation of Provence. They came within ſome miles of the ſhore, but found their landing very difficult, for that they had bin diſcouered by one of the caſtles of Navarrin, which had giuen the alarum vnto the whole countrey, ſo as K they were forced to paſſe on to ſome more eaſie conqueſt, to the end their voiage might not proue vnprofitable: wherfore they ſailed into the Archipelague, & came neere to the coaſt of Morea, ten leagus from Corinth, where in the night they landed 800 men vnder the con-Corinth taken and ſpoiled by the knights of Malta. duct of the commander of Cremeaux, generall at land; this troup marched towards Corinth and an houre before day were at the town gates to force them. Some Turks tooke armes, but this weake reſiſtance could not ſtay the knights from entring with their troups, they ſackt the towne, and hauing taken what ſpoile was portable, they caried away with them 500 ſlaues.
After this triumph, the Chriſtians made a happy retrait, and in good order, notwithſtanding all the attempts of the Turks horſe and foot, who were drawn together in great numbers, making 10000 ſouldiors, for the countrey is very populous; in view of whom they imbarked L their ſpoile and ſlaues. Hereby it appeares that this was one of the moſt deſperat enterpriſes that hath been of long time ſeene. For to attempt a place ſo far from their retrait, in ſo populous a countrey, which vpon the leaſt alarum, may draw together tenne or twelue thouſand Turkes, and to make their retreat with ſo ſmall a number, againſt ſuch great troupes which purſued them: Doubtleſſe wee muſt confeſſe, that as they ſhewed great valour, and had good fortune, ſo they vndertooke a very daungerous enterpriſe. Thus the knights of Malta vanquiſhed, whom we might terme the maſters of the Mediterranean ſea, if the reue-nues of their order would ſuffer them to ſet forth ſhipping, and forces equall to their valour.

But to follow the variable courſe of the hiſtorie, let vs obſerue the different occupations of Chriſtians. At Prage the Germanes entertained themſelues, with the conſideration of M a Crowne which appeared in the Firmament, ouer that Citie about the middeſt of October, giuing a verie great light, and about it armies of men fighting who ſhould haue it. At that time the Emperour Rodulphus was vpon the Weſt, or declining of his dayes, and Matthias who ſucceeded him in the Empire, then king of Hvngarie, was vp-on

A on the ſunne riſing of his triumphs. Many expounded this heauenly apparition, as a preſage of happineſſe and good fortune to Matthias: he enioyed the crowne of HVNGIRIA already, and by deſignation that of BOHEMIA, and now they did prognoſticate vnto him that of the Romanes. Doubtleſſe men which aſpire after great fortunes, doe rather adorne the ſun riſing, than the ſetting; and mans life when it declines, taſtes of the lees. The flouriſhing glorie of Matthias, his age, and his actions in the warres, did adde nothing to the authoritie of other men in the countrie, but did mightily ſettle his owne. Three ſunnes which were ſeene in the firmament ouer VIENNA, the chiefe citie of AVSTRIA, confirmed the Germanes more in this their hope, that he ſhould haue the third crowne of the Romans. This laſt apparition
B happened the yeare following.

About the end of the yeare, ſome of the Engliſh Embaſſadours men entring into quarrell with certaine Iamoglans of the next Serail: from words they fell to blowes; during which tumult one of the embaſſadors men threw a ſtone, & ſmote a Iamoglan on the forhead, wherof he died within few houres after. The Aga of the ſerraill cõplained hereof to the grand Viſier, who preſently ſent the Subbaſſa of GALATA, to make inquiry of the fact: the embaſſador went himſelfe to the ſerraill, & ſent for his men which had bin in the quarrel, willing the Turks to deſigne the partie which had thrown the ſtone: who all with one ſhout ran vpon one Simon Dibbins, a man that was newly come from CANDIE where he had ſerued in the Venetian garriſons, and was now entertained into the embaſſadors ſeruice. This Simon was not hee that
C threw the ſtone: notwithſtanding the Turks would none but him; on him they laid hands, and dragd him away. The embaſſador interpoſing himſelfe, & offring to pledge for him, was thruſt away by them, his men beaten, & one of his pages wounded: whereupon he complained to the graund Viſier, but preuailed little; for to priſon they dragged this Simon, and there kept him a whole month; neither could he be releaſed, albeit the Engliſh nation offred great ſums to ranſome his life: for the Turks would needs haue blood for blood. The day of execution being appointed, the embaſſador ſent his chaplain to the priſon where this Simon was, to prepare him for death: vnto whom (examining him how he had formerly liued) hee confeſſed, that in ENGLAND ſome few yeres before he had killed a man, for which fact he fled thẽce into CANDIE: from whence he came to CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was to ſuffer for that which D he did not: the iuſt iudgment of God purſuing him to the ſhedding of his blood in CONSTANTINOPLE among Turkes vndeſeruedly, for the blood which he ſhed in ENGLAND wilfully. He was hanged at the Embaſſadors gates, his head and heeles the next night were ſtollen away by the Turkes, as it was thought, to vſe in ſome kind of ſorcery, the other parts of his body they had leaue to take downe and burie.

This yeare 1612 they did celebrate at CONSTANTINOPLE a double nuptiall feaſt; for the mariages of Baſſa Mehemet ſonne to the deceaſed Cicala, with the Sultans ſiſter, and of Baſſa Mechmet, Admirall at ſea, he whom wee haue ſeene lately returne from EGYPT, and bring to CONSTANTINOPLE the reuenues of that rich kingdom, with the eldeſt daughter of his emperour. For the feaſts of yong Cycala, the Spahi made courſes on horſebacke with battleaxes
E and barres, in the open place neere vnto the ſeraill, where they made diuers fireworks of verie great charge, but of ſmal inuention, & they gaue preſents to aboue 2000 perſons, beſides the charge of the banqueting ſtuffe which amounted to aboue 20000 crownes. The pompe was double, for the Sultans women did celebrat that day with the greateſt ladies of the Port, and the men ſeparated in other places did ſolemniſe it in like maner. But the magnificence of the mariage of the Baſſa Admirall at ſea with Achmats eldeſt daughter, had far more luſtre at the port. The ceremony was performed on the 30 of Iune, 20 daies after the other; and the order of this pompe, as well as ſome other which we haue deſcribed in this Hiſtorie, requires a particular relation.

The day before the conſummation of the mariage, they ſent the brides moueables and ie-
F wels, from the Seraill to the bridegromes lodging, with this order and ſtate that followeth: Firſt there marched 500 Ianizaries on foot, being followed with the grand Prouoſt of CONSTANTINOPLE, and the generall Surueiour, both on horſebacke and attired in cloth of gold: the Aga or Collonell of the Ianizaries very proudly adorned, and inuironed with ſome Ianizaries marched alone on horſback: after theſe two hundred men of qualitie wel mounted, and richly attired, followed with a ſlow pace. The laſt which marcht in this pompe or cere-monie, were the Taliſmans, Centons, Emirs, and other miniſters of Mahomets Clergie. And presently followed after the Baſſa Achmat, Deftarda, or high Treaſurer, who conducted the mooueables, as choſen by the Sultan to be godfather or Sagois to the bride, being inuironed with twelue footmen attired in long robes of gold. After him followed the moueables, apparell, and iewels, which made the brides truſſe, hauing in the head excellent muſicke after the Turkiſh manner, of Hoboyes and Kettledrums on horſbacke. G

Wherein the brides moueables conſiſted.

Theſe mooueables, or this truſſe conſiſted of 27 preſents. The firſt was a little hat all of gold, couered with pretious ſtones, & with pantofles or womens ſhoes after the Turkiſh faſhion of pure gold, enricht with turquoiſes, and rubies: A booke of Mahomets law, the couering whereof was of maſſie gold all ſet with diamonds, many braceletes, and other rare deuices for women of pure gold, with many precious ſtones: A little coffer a cubit long, and H halfe as broad, all of chriſtall of the rocke, hauing the corners of gold, in the which were to be ſeene great diamonds and huge pearles, to the value of 80000 pounds ſterling: After this pretious coffer, were caried many ſmocks imbroidered with gold and pearle, and headbands for the forehead, with many robes of cloth of gold. All this was diſtributed into 27 preſents as we haue ſaid, and caried with great pompe by 27 men on foot.

The brides ſlaues.

After theſe preſents followed 11 caroches full of yong maidens, ſlaues to ſerue the bride: theſe caroches were couered & ſhut, and either of them attended by 2 eunuchs Moores: after theſe followed 28 virgins ſlaues, attired in cloth of gold, and accompanied by 28 blacke Eunuches all on horſebacke, and richly clad. After which were ſeene 240 mules, loaden with tents of tapiſtry, cloth of gold, ſattin, veluet, with the ground of gold, with many cuſhions, I which are the chaires the ladies of Turkie vſe, with many other rich and ſumptuous mooueables. Such was the Truſſe which this yong princeſſe brought to her ſpouſes houſe. Doubtleſſe this equipage was ſtately, and did well become the pompe and greatneſſe of the Othomans houſe, from whence ſhe had iſſued, the mightieſt and richeſt of all the royall houſes in EVROPE, yea I dare boldly ſay of all the world.

The order of the brides conducting to her husband.

The mariage day being come, the bride was conducted to her husbands lodging, with no leſſe pompe and ſtate than her moueables. The Ianizaries marcht firſt as they had formerly done, being followed by the grand Prouoſt, the Surueior, their Aga, and many other officers of the port. The Emirs (who are deſcended from Mahomet, and alone carrie greene turbants) marcht after to the number of 80. This name of Emir is as much to ſay as lord. They which K weare them anſwer not, and obey none but their chiefe, called Mirabachi, and their voice in iudgement ſtands for two: they were followed by the Taliſmans or prieſts of Mahomets law, and by a great number which ſtudie it, and which aſpire to the offices of Cadis or Iudges, of Cadileſquiers or Mufti. The Viſiers or ſupreme Iudges of the Turks eſtate, who iudge of all affaires in counſel, came after with the grand Viſier, who is lieutenant general to the Turkiſh emperor throughout his whole empire, and keeps the ſeales of his empire. He had on his left hand (which is the moſt honourable ranke in Turkie) the grand Mufti, or ſupreme Biſhop of their law. The muſicke followed after on horſebacke conſiſting of 30 men with drummes and Hoboies, being followed by 8 Egiptians, which caried biſcaine, tabors, & did a thouſand apiſh trickes. Theſe were followed by 40 muſitians, marching two & two, ſome playing of L citterns, others of harps, and ſome of lutes after the Turkiſh maner. A foole (held for a ſaint amongſt them) being muſled with a cap & a cloke couered with mutton bones, danc't & ſung with theſe inſtruments: fiftie of the chiefe officers of the Arſenall marcht after them, and 30 men with hammers & other iron inſtruments, to breake down whatſoeuer aduanced too far in the ſtreets, and might hinder the free paſſage of two trees of an immenſe height, laden with diuers ſorts of fruits all of wax, caried by many men, & ſupported from the top and the midſt with ropes. After theſe trees came 20 officers belonging to Achmat Baſſa the high Treaſurer, Godfather to the bride. And he himſelf alone richly attired, & proudly mounted, after whom came 2 great torches light, caried by many ſlaues, & then a third torch of a wonderfull bignes, all couered with plats of gold, & ſhining more with pretious ſtones than the flame which M burnt. The Raiſſer Aga with 50 of the princeſſes officers, followed theſe lights, & after them was carried a great canopie of crimſon veluet, and after it another greater, couered with plates of gold, whoſe curtaines being ſhut on all ſides, hung down to the ground. Vnder this canopie was the princeſſe on horſebacke, with ſome of her blacke eunuches, her caroch followed

A lowed couered with cloth of gold, and drawen by foure great white horſes, wonderful beautifull. Then followed eight other caroches, in which were a great number of the brides maids with many Negroes gelt; and finally, 25 virgin ſlaues, choſen amongſt the faireſt, all on horſbacke, hauing their haire confuſedly hanging vpon their ſhoulders. Such was the pompe of this mariage: But many times the nuptiall feaſt is intermixt with funerall mourning. For not many dayes after, the Sultans ſecond daughter, promiſed to Naſſuf Baſſa, was caried to her graue without any pompe or honour: for the Turks make no great eſteeme of women. The death of the Sultans daughter.

The day after the mariage, the graund Seignior did cruelly beat his Sultana, the mother of this daughter whom he had maried to the captaine Baſſa, he ſtabbed her with his handiarre or B dagger thorow the cheek, and trod her vnder his feet. The reaſon was, becauſe ſhe had ſtrangled a fauourite of his, which was one of his ſiſters ſlaues, whom the graund Seignior hauing ſeene, and being enamoured with her, ſent for her. The Sultana hearing thereof, cauſed her to bee brought to her lodging, where ſhee ſtript her of her apparell, ſtrangled her, and put her clothes vpon one of her owne ſlaues, whom ſhee ſent to the Sultan inſtead of the other, and at her returne ſtrangled her alſo, as ſhee had done many others when they once appeared to be with child by the graund Seignior. The grand Seignior beats his Sultana.

The plague beginning furiouſly to ſpoile the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, the Sultan was forced to return to his country palace, called the Serail of Darut Baſſa, to auoid the danger of this violent contagion: the which makes me thinke, that the Turkiſh emperors for their own C profit diſpenſe with ſome articles of their faith; for as we haue ſaid before, The Turks are ſo obſtinatly tied to the belieſe of predeſtination, as they will not vouchſafe to turne from a peſtiferous bodie, when it is caried to the graue, and much leſſe forbeare to viſit his friends being ſick of the plague, for that (ſay they) if we muſt need die of this contagion, it is in vaine to flie it, for it will find vs whereſoeuer; if not, our health ſhall neuer be impaired, although we conuerſe with thoſe that are ſicke of this diſeaſe. But their Sultans know well how to flie the danger, yea & to cauſe them to be led vnder the arms that come to kiſſe his hand, leſt they ſhould offer him ſome violence. Thus we ſee the defect of falſe religions, when as we ſee this mark of vniuerſalitie in the faith taken away: for there euery man beleeues according to his priuat intereſt, as well as among many others which haue ſeparated themſelues from the truth, to canD ton themſelues in their errors, where we doe often trie the diuerſitie of their beliefe. A great plague at Constantinople.

Sultan Achmat being in his place of Darut Baſſa, and going to viſit a ſtately Moſque which he cauſed to be built there; a Deruis or religious Turke thruſt on by ſome deuilliſh furie, caſt a great ſtone at him to beat him downe; but the blow of this deteſtable traitour, fell vpon his ſhoulder, and hurt him but lightly. Achmat commanded they ſhould draw from this wretch the confeſſion of his confederats: but the officers of the Port cauſed him to bee executed the next day, ſomewhat to ſuddenly, and bv a death too honourable, for a crime ſo full of abomination; for they cauſed his head to be cut off. A Deruis of the ſame order had in former times ſought to murther the emperour Mahomet the ſecond. A Deruis ſticket to kill the emperour.

On the 14 of Aprill the ladie Anne Glouer, wife to ſir Thomas Glouer, embaſſador reſiding at E CONSTANTINOPLE for the Engliſh, was buried with very great ſolemnitie, the like had not bin ſeene in that countrey, ſince the Turks conquered CONSTANTINOPLE. There were preſent at this funerall of moſt nations in the world; the ſermon was preached in a large garden vnder a cypres tree: and although but few of thoſe preſent did vnderſtand it, yet it wrought this effect; that whereas the Ieſuites and Friers had formerly poſſeſt both Turks, Iewes, and other people, that the Engliſh nation ſince the change of their Religion, had neither churches, nor any forme of diuine ſeruice. Hereby they perceiued, that they had both, and ſerued God far more decently and deuoutly than they themſelues; inſomuch that the Ieſuits being aſhamed of their impoſtures, and ſlaunderous vntruth, durſt not for a while after walke the ſtreets, for feare of the Turks, who threatned them for ſo much belying the Engliſh. The ſermon being F ended, the body was carried from PERA vnto the Engliſh graues, which were almoſt a mile from the place, it was cloſed in lead & laid in a charoch couered ouer with black veluet, and the horſes with black cloth. The Dutch Embaſſador, the Hungarian Agent, the French Collonell, with a great number of all nations both men and women followed her to her graue. The tombe was of faire marble built foure ſquare almoſt the height of a man, hauing an Epitaph ingrauen thereon. The funerall of the lady Glouer the embaſſadors wife.

Wee haue ſeene the yeare before the Iſland and towne of LANGO ſpoiled by the gallies of G MALTA and NAPLES, but the caſtle was ſaued from ruine, by the reſiſtance it made againſt the Chriſtians attempts: But this yeare in Iune the great duke of Tuſcans gallies running ouer the Archepelague, aſſailed it ſo furiouſly, as they forced and ſpoiled it, carrying away 1200 priſoners. Mechmet Baſſa Admirall at ſea, whom wee ſaw euen now buſied at his nuptiall pompe, with the Emperours eldeſt daughter, being aduertiſed of theſe ſpoiles of the Florentines, by the daily complaints of the Turkes which loſt their ſhipping, and of many other enterpriſes attempted vpon his maſters countries lying neere the ſea ſhore, hee parted from CONSTANTINOPLE in Auguſt with three and thirtie great gallies, hauing commanded all the Beys of the iſlands and townes in the Archipelague, to ioyne with him, with as many gallies as they could make, to ſtop the Chriſtians courſes in the Weſt. But whileſt that he is buſied in thoſe ſeas, the Pirates of RVSSIA deſcending into the Euxine ſea, by the mouthes of H thoſe riuers which diſcharge their waters into that ſea, ouerran and ſpoiled the Turks coaſts in thoſe parts.

Courſes of the Ruſſians and Tartars vpon the Turks.

At the firme land Conſtantine one of the pretending princes in MOLDAVIA, annoid all that had any dependance vpon the Turk. A part of that great armie of the king of Polands, which had mutined for their pay, ſpoiled PODOLIA; and a prince of the Tartarians diſcontent for that Achmat had preferred a couſin of his before him in the inueſtiture of the Realme of the Tartars Precopians, with 5000 ſouldiors ſpoiled the riuers of MOLDAVIA vnder the Turkes dominion, and he did the like in the gulph of Nicopolis.

Troubles in Moldauia.

This was at ſuch time when as miſerable MOLDAVIA was the theater, whereas the Turkes, I Tartars, and Moldauians acted a bloodie tragedie, at the coſtes and charges of the poore countreymen. For Tomſho hauing beene choſen Vayuod or prince of that prouince by the Turke; Conſtantine who could not indure that he ſhould raigne, armed the countrie, ouerran it, ſpoiled it, and made hauocke of all, detaining two Capigi priſoners, whom the Sultan had ſent vnto him, with commandement to obey his wil, and a prohibition not to trouble Tomſho in the poſſeſſion of his prouince. But this was a meſſage of hard diſgeſtion to Conſtantine, hee could not with patience yeeld to this ceſſion of MOLDAVIA: And inſtead of ſending theſe meſſengers backe to the Turke with an anſwer, he carried them with him into POLONIA, whither he went to demand ſuccours, and cauſed them to be guarded as priſoners. In the meane time by the ſupport and aid of Potoſſy Gouernour of VELIN his brother in law, he obtained K from the king of POLAND, that he ſhould be ſupported againſt prince Tomſho his competitor, whom the Turke had aduaunced; and to make his entrie into MOLDAVIA more eaſie, they reſolued to ſend an Embaſſadour vnto CONSTANTINOPLE, to intreat Achmat to call backe Tomſho to his Port, that Conſtantine might quietly enioy MOLDAVIA, and to acquaint him with the right and intereſt the Polonians had by their capitulations with the Turkes to name a Vayuod or Prince in that prouince, to the end no wrong might be done vnto them.

A Polonian embaſſador arreſted at Conſtantinople.

This Polonian Embaſſador being arriued at CONSTANTINOPLE, (thinking to be preſently diſpatcht, either by a grant or deniall of his demaund, and not to ſtay aboue fifteene or twentie dayes) being viſited at his arriuall by all the Embaſſadours of Chriſtian kings and princes which remained there: But inſtead of audience after ſixe weeks attendance, he was arreſted L and detained priſoner: vnderſtanding from the Turkes that he ſhould haue no libertie, vntill that the two Capigi, whom prince Conſtantine caried into POLAND, were releaſed.

The Turk armes to inuade Moldauia.

The troubles and deuiſions among Chriſtians, neighbours to the Turke, haue alwaies ſerued as a bridge for this infidell to inuade them, and by this aduantage to vſurpe ſuch townes and countries as lie fit for him. Now that VALACHIA, MOLDAVIA, yea and TRANSYLVANIA, are toſt and turmoild with continuall diſorders and combuſtions: the Sultan ſeemes to embrace this occaſion, to make himſelfe ſoueraigne of theſe prouinces, and to get poſſeſſion of all that lies betwixt the riuer of Danow, the mountaines of SARMATIA, the riuer of Tibiſcus, and the Euxine ſea. He imployes all his thoughts and inuentions vpon this ſubiect, to bring his deſignes to effect. He armes and drawes forces about BELGRADE, vnder the conduct of M Baſſa Mahomet Belzergi: He commands the Tartarians to enter into MOLDAVIA, and he ſent a nauall armie towards the mouth of the riuer Danowe, which made the fregats of RVSSIA to diſlodge, the which had continually made inroades and ſpoyles vpon his lands. Battori prince of TRANSYLVENIA was at that time before the towne of CROMSTAD, which hee had beſieged, besieged, but the tediousnesse of this siege made him resolue to send an Embassador to CONSTANTINOPLE, to demaund succours from the Grand Seignior, to the end hee might be able to continue this siege and to take the towne: hee gaue this charge to Andrew Giezy, and sent him to the Sultans Port: but instead of seruing his master faithfully, he practised a detestable treason against him, to put the Turke in full possession of TRANSYLVANIA, and to make him absolute soueraigne. The practise was concluded after this manner, That the Bassa Mahomet Belzergi should enter the prouince with his armie, and that Giezi should ioyne with him with certaine troups, and should deliuer vnto him VARADIN, LIPPA, and some other strong and important places; and for recompence he should inuest him in the principalitie of TRANSYLVANIA, in the place of Battori, and vnder the authoritie of Achmat.

He demaunds succours from the Turke, and is betrayed.

This treason might haue drawen this miserable prouince into ruine, and it may be the rest neer adiacent, if it had taken the effect which the treachery of Giezy had promised vnto himselfe. But the Bassa of BVDA vnderstanding that Battori had some vent of the practise at the Port, and that being now in great feare and perturbation, he had raised the siege from before CROMSTAD, and was readie to cast himselfe into the armes of the Palatine of HVNGARIE, and to craue relefe from him; The craftie Bassa knowing that this course would be preiudiciall for the Sultan; and finding that the deposing of Battori would be more difficult than they expected, hee diuerted Mahomet Bassa from attempting any thing against Battori or TRANSYLVANIA. This act shewes sufficiently that Christian princes which thinke to shelter themselues vnder the shadow of the Turkish Crescent, are verie ill assured: for he neuer failes to stirre vp enemies against them, to make them sue for succours, and himselfe necessarie; Then in the end he expels them, and becomes absolute master of their countries. It was also said, that the Bassa Mahomet would not attempt any thing in TRANSYLVANIA, by reason of the election of the Emperour Matthias, whereof the Bassa of BVDA was assured by the Embassadour which the said Emperour sent to CONSTANTINOPLE, to carrie the presents vnto the Sultan, which Embassadour was honourably entertained at BVDA by the said Bassa, and from thence conducted safely to CONSTANTINOPLE.

But not to keepe these Turkish troupes idle, Mahomet Bassa being aduertised that Constantine the pretending prince in MOLDAVIA, had bin in POLAND to craue some assistance from thence, hee resolued to imploy his forces that way, to dispossesse him, and to settle another.

But the better to vnderstand the beginning and successe of these Moldauian warres, wee must make a repetition of that which past some yeares before. In the yere 1608, Ieremy Mohyla prince or Vayuod of MOLDAVIA, died, committing the gouernment to his brother Simeon, during the minoritie of his three sonnes, Constantine, Alexander, and Bougdan, the eldest being but eight yeares old. He left three daughters maried to three generous princes of POLONIA, Potosky, Visinouisky, and Corresky. Prince Simeon continued in the gouernment vntill the yeare 1611; After whose decease the young prince Constantine by the persuasion of his mother, that hee might safely take vpon him the gouernment of MOLDAVIA, and not attend any confirmation from the Sultan: For that prince Simeon who had beene confirmed by the Turke which then raigned, was but Tutor to his nephew, entred the gouernment. At this time there remained at CONSTANTINOPLE, one Stephano, or Tomsho, who had of a long time practised the fauour of one of the Visiers called Mehemet, an Eunuch of GEORGIA (who was then Chimacham, or Lieutenant to the graund Visier) and of some other Bassaes, as well by money as by other practises, suggesting falsely that he was sonne to prince Aaron, who had been Vayuod of MOLDAVIA before the deceased Ieremie, and he preuailed so by his practises and corruption (whereunto the Turkes are more subiect than any nation in the world) as he was admitted to the principalitie by the graund Seignior, and hauing giuen him to vnderstand by the Visier, that Constantine had thrust himselfe rashly into the gouernment, and that hee would not acknowledge him for his lord and soueraigne, nor pay the yearely tribute, which was 40000 chequines, he sent Foussеyen Aga with 20000 Turkes and Tartarians, to settle Stephen or Tomsho in MOLDAVIA, and to expell prince Constantine; which armie marched so secretly, as they had in a manner surprised him, yet drawing together a head of 10000 men, hee resolued to attend the euent. The Aga sent to acquaint him with his commission, and among other things threatned him, that if he would not suffer him to proclaime Stephen Vayuod of MOLDAVIA, and yeeld him the citie of YAS free, hee would cut him in pieces.

Where-

Constantines answer to the Turks Aga.

Whereunto Constantine made answere, by the aduice of the prince Potosky his brother in law, That the graund Seignior had been abused: for if hee had vnderstood, that his predecessour had graunted to the deceased prince Ieremie his father, and to prince Simeon his vnckle, that he should succeed his said father in the gouernment: It was not credible that he would seeke to dispossesse him by force without hearing, and install in his place an vnknown person, who had falsely supposed himselfe to be the sonne of a prince of MOLDAVIA: neither should they find, that hee had refused to acknowledge the Sultan for his soueraigne prince, or denied to continue the same tribute which his father and vnckle had paid: But if the Aga would proceed without any respect to his offers, hee did hope that the true God of battaile would maintaine him in his iust defence, and would not suffer an vsurper to preuaile ouer a lawfull prince. Fousseyen Aga, who had no will to capitulat with prince Constantine, being corrupted by Stephen with presents and promises, aduanced with his armie, so as the next day they ioyned battell; but the Moldauians opprest with multitudes of Turkes, Tartarians, and Valachians, could not make it good. Wherefore Potosky intreated prince Constantine to saue himselfe, and to suffer him to finish the battaile: But he could by no meanes persuade him, still resoluing to attend the euent. Wherupon they went both again to the charge with such troups as they had left, and defeated many of the Turkes forces; but being opprest with a new supply of 2000 horse which the Aga sent by Stephen, they were constrained to yeeld themselues to the mercy of their enemies. Prince Constantine fell to the Tartarians share, either for that he had beene taken prisoner by some of them, or else was giuen them by Fousseyen Aga, to draw a ransome from him, and be instead of their pay. But they made no great vse of him: for as they led him away, passing the riuer of Niestre, he leapt into it, thinking either to saue himselfe by swimming, or vnwilling to suruiue his disgrace. And as for prince Potosky, hee was carried to CONSTANTINOPLE, and was put into the blacke tower, which is a prison appointed by men of qualitie, where he continued vntill the yeare 1616. The losse of this battell by Constantine, gaue an easie entrance to Stephen into MOLDAVIA, no man daring oppose himselfe against the Turkes forces: so as Fousseyen Aga caused Stephen to bee proclaimed prince of MOLDAVIA in the citie of YAS, and then dismist his armie, and returned to CONSTANTINOPLE. Such was the fortune of the prince of MOLDAVIA, ruined by the Turks, and such was the disorder and confusion of his miserable countrey.

Constantinople afflicted with grashoppers.

This summer CONSTANTINOPLE and the country round about was annoyed with abundance of grashoppers, as it had been in the former yeare: But to free themselues from this deuouring vermine, about the midst of Iuly, the Patriarch of CONSTANTINOPLE, and ALEXANDRIA, with diuers other Bishops, and Calloires attired in their copes and other ornaments, went forth in solemne manner at the gate of ANDRIANOPLE, being the North gate of the citie. Whereupon (said the Greekes) they all perisht: and indeed about this time infinit heaps of them were found dead; but not by reason of their curse, for most were dead before they cursed them, and were to bee seene dead vpon euery bush and twigge of a tree before their curse, and many liued after their curse, and continued vntill the next summer. The cold deawes which fell this summer (being extraordinarie) were thought to bee the naturall cause thereof, God causing these deawes to fall, to free the countrey from these deuouring creatures.

The troubles of Transyluania.

Let vs now describe the miseries of the Transyluanian, and of his prouince, a table so often represented in this historie. Gabriel Battori who gouerned TRANSYLVANIA, as lawfully descended from the soueraigne princes thereof, hauing made himselfe a tributarie to the Turke, and by his impious actions mingled Mahomets impietie with the Christian religion, and moreouer, exceeding in his crueltie, became a memorable example to all posteritie, that princes which carrie the glorious name of Christians, when they haue once layed aside all feare of the soueraigne of princes, cannot attend, but a miserable end in their raigne, conformable to the course of their enormities. So Gabriell Battori holding it a law of state, to settle his affaires with the ruine of Religion, allies himselfe with the Turke, and with him afflicts the Christian prouinces. But seeing many factions made against him, as well by the descendents of Botscay, as by Giezy, Bethlem Gabor, and some other, he supports himselfe with the forces of Andrew Nage, the head of the rebels in high HVNGARIE, who came vnto him to the siege before CROMSTAD to assist him in his affaires. Battori entertained him with all shewes

A shewes of courtesie, inuited him to dinner in his Tent, and for a greater demonstration of friendship after dinner they two went to take the aire on horseback. Nage had drunke after the Hungarian manner, Battori intreated him to runne his horse a carreere, and he refused it, the which Battori taking for an offence, spake many words of contempt vnto him, and he answered him in the same manner, being more inflamed with wine, then gouerned by reason. Battori being wonderfully offended, that a man of no sort, being but a poore souldier of fortune, crept vp to some authority among souldiers, but by degrees of Rebellion should giue him such words for indignitie, gaue him three blowes on the head with a Battleaxe which he held in his hand and slew him. Thus Nage swims iustly in his owne blood, hauing wickedly and to the ruin of his Country floted in the waies of inconstancie, and populer Tu-B mults; and so he died as he had liued. Battori kils Nage.

But Battori found himselfe dayly oppresst with many affaires, which draue him insensibly to his ruine. Peter Decaci kinsman to the deceased Botscay annoyed him on the one side with troupes of souldiors. Andrew Giezi (who had betrayed him in his embassie to CONSTANTINOPLE) leuied forces to prosecute him; and Bethlehem Gabor a Nobleman of TRANSYLVANIA, and assisted by the Turke, tooke many places from him, after that Giezi had forced him to raise his siege at CROMSTAD, and generally all TRANSYLVANIA, reuolted against this prince. To see more plainely in the obscuritie of these confused disorders, you must vnderstand that this prouince is peopled by three seuerall nations, the Sicules, Saxons, and Hun-
C garians. The Sicules (descended from the Scithians) came with Attila king of the Hunnes into PANNONIA, now called HVNGARIE, and taking their way towards their countrie, they inhabited that part of TRANSYLVANIA, which lies next to MOLDAVIA, and deuiding themselues into seuen Colloneys; they built the townes of KISDI, ORBAI, SCIPSI, CYKVDVARHEH, ARANIOS and MAROS. The Saxons (mutinying against the gouernment of the Emperour Charlemaine king of FRANCE, for certaine impositions wherewith he had charged them) retired into TRANSYLVANIA, and by force seized vpon that part of the countrey which confineth vpon VALACHIA, where they built the townes of HERMEINSTAD, otherwise called CIBIN, CROMSTAD, NEZEN, or BISTRIC, MEDVVISCH, SCHESBVRG, CLAVSENBVRG, and ALBA IVLIA. The Hungarians inhabited this prouince from the time of saint Stephen king of D HVNGARIE, and hauing mastred the other nations, they obtained such preheminence among them, as since their successors haue caused themselues to bee called Nobles of TRANSYLVANIA, and the Vayuods or princes of the countrey, haue been taken from among them. The townes of VARRADIN, DEVER, ZILAHI, GELA, and some others owe their beginnings vnto them. The greatest part of these three nations which inhabit TRANSYLVANIA, were reuolted against Battori: but particularly the Saxons had taken armes against him, his great crueltie hauing forced them to this extreame remedie.

All the three nations against Battori.

Battori being thus abandoned by his subiects prosecuted by his nobilitie, and forsaken of all the world, knowing not whither to flie for succour, and not daring to trust vnto the Turk, who openly fauoured Gabor, he resolued to trie if he could by presents draw the Emperour
E Matthias to giue him any assistance: Wherefore hee sent Embassadors vnto him to promise all subiection and obedience; and hee sent for presents, a long robe or sacerdotall cloake of gold, set with pearle and precious stones, certaine plumes of blacke Herrons, adorned with precious stones, a Turkish sword, the scabberd being of siluer richly set with iewels, tenne blacke horses with rich furniture embroidered with gold and siluer, and a Turkish horse hauing halfe the body and legges of the colour of gold, with his furniture of crimson richly imbroidered. He laboured to haue the Emperour giue notice to the Bassa of BVDA that this attempt of the Turkes against TRANSYLVANIA was against the articles of peace: but the Bassa made answere, That his Emperour was not to bee blamed, if hee seized vpon that prouince which did immediatly belong vnto him, and kept it quiet from the practises of others. But
F Battori relying not wholly vpon this support, but desiring to haue more strings to his bowe, sent Embassadours to the Sultan, with rare and rich presents, who had secret treaties and counsells with the Bassaes, the which Negronius the Emperours Embassadour residing at CONSTANTINOPLE discouering, hee sent word vnto the Emperour, that he entertained a monster among men.

Conſtantines anſwer to the Turki Aga.

Whereunto Conſtantine made anſwere, by the aduice of the prince Potosky his brother in law, That the graund Seignior had been abuſed: for if hee had vnderſtood, that his predeceſſour had graunted to the deceaſed prince Ieremie his father, and to prince Simeon his vnckle, that he ſhould ſucceed his ſaid father in the gouernment: It was not credible that he would ſeeke to diſpoſſeſſe him by force without hearing, and inſtall in his place an vnknown perſon, who had falſely ſuppoſed himſelfe to be the ſonne of a prince of MOLDAVIA: neither ſhould they find, that hee had refuſed to acknowledge the Sultan for his ſoueraigne prince, or denied to continue the ſame tribute which his father and vnckle had paid: But if the Aga would proceed without any reſpect to his offers, hee did hope that the true God of battaile would maintaine him in his iuſt defence, and would not ſuffer an vſurper to preuaile ouer a lawfull prince. Fouſſeyen Aga, who had no will to capitulat with prince Conſtantine, being corrupted by Stephen with preſents and promiſes, aduanced with his armie, ſo as the next day they ioyned battell; but the Moldauians oppreſt with multitudes of Turkes, Tartarians, and Valachians, could not make it good. Wherefore Potosky intreated prince Conſtantine to ſaue himſelfe, and to ſuffer him to finiſh the battaile: But he could by no meanes perſuade him, ſtill reſoluing to attend the euent. Wherupon they went both again to the charge with ſuch troups as they had left, and defeated many of the Turkes forces; but being oppreſt with a new ſupply of 2000 horſe which the Aga ſent by Stephen, they were conſtrained to yeeld themſelues to the mercy of their enemies. Prince Conſtantine fell to the Tartarians ſhare, either for that he had beene taken priſoner by ſome of them, or elſe was giuen them by Fouſſeyen Aga, to draw a ranſome from him, and be inſtead of their pay. But they made no great vſe of him: for as they led him away, paſſing the riuer of Nieſtre, he leapt into it, thinking either to ſaue himſelfe by ſwimming, or vnwilling to ſuruiue his diſgrace. And as for prince Potosky, hee was carried to CONSTANTINOPLE, and was put into the blacke tower, which is a priſon appointed by men of qualitie, where he continued vntill the yeare 1616. The loſſe of this battell by Conſtantine, gaue an eaſie entrance to Stephen into MOLDAVIA, no man daring oppoſe himſelfe againſt the Turkes forces: ſo as Fouſſeyen Aga cauſed Stephen to bee proclaimed prince of MOLDAVIA in the citie of YAS, and then diſmiſt his armie, and returned to CONSTANTINOPLE. Such was the fortune of the prince of MOLDAVIA, ruined by the Turks, and ſuch was the diſorder and confuſion of his miſerable countrey.

Thus Nage ſwims iuſtly in his owne blood, hauing wickedly and to the ruin of his Country floted in the waies of inconſtancie, and populer Tumults; and ſo he died as he had liued. Battori kils Nage.

But Battori found himſelfe dayly oppreſt with many affaires, which draue him inſenſibly to his ruine. Peter Decaci kinſman to the deceaſed Botſcay annoyed him on the one ſide with troupes of ſouldiors. Andrew Giezi (who had betrayed him in his embaſſie to CONSTANTINOPLE) leuied forces to proſecute him; and Bethlehem Gabor a Nobleman of TRANSYLVANIA, and aſſiſted by the Turke, tooke many places from him, after that Giezi had forced him to raiſe his ſiege at CROMSTAD, and generally all TRANSYLVANIA, reuolted againſt this prince. To ſee more plainely in the obſcuritie of theſe confuſed diſorders, you muſt vnderſtand that this prouince is peopled by three ſeuerall nations, the Sicules, Saxons, and Hungarians. The Sicules (deſcended from the Scithians) came with Attila king of the Hunnes into PANNONIA, now called HVNGARIE, and taking their way towards their countrie, they inhabited that part of TRANSYLVANIA, which lies next to MOLDAVIA, and deuiding themſelues into ſeuen Colloneys; they built the townes of KISDI, ORBAI, SCIPSI, CYKVDVARHEH, ARANIOS and MAROS. The Saxons (mutinying againſt the gouernment of the Emperour Charlemaine king of FRANCE, for certaine impoſitions wherewith he had charged them) retired into TRANSYLVANIA, and by force ſeized vpon that part of the countrey which confineth vpon VALACHIA, where they built the townes of HERMEINSTAD, otherwiſe called CIBIN, CROMSTAD, NEZEN, or BISTRIC, MEDVVISCH, SCIESBVRG, CLAVSENBVRG, and ALBA IVLIA. The Hungarians inhabited this prouince from the time of ſaint Stephen king of HVNGARIE, and hauing maſtred the other nations, they obtained ſuch preheminence among them, as ſince their ſucceſſors haue cauſed themſelues to bee called Nobles of TRANSYLVANIA, and the Vayuods or princes of the countrey, haue been taken from among them. The townes of VARRADIN, DEVER, ZILAHI, GELA, and ſome others owe their beginnings vnto them. The greateſt part of theſe three nations which inhabit TRANSYLVANIA, were reuolted againſt Battori: but particularly the Saxons had taken armes againſt him, his great crueltie hauing forced them to this extreame remedie. Parties againſt Battori. Deuiſion of the people of Tranſyluania. All the three nations againſt Battori.

Battori being thus abandoned by his ſubiects proſecuted by his nobilitie, and forſaken of all the world, knowing not whither to flie for ſuccour, and not daring to truſt vnto the Turk, who openly fauoured Gabor, he reſolued to trie if he could by preſents draw the Emperour Matthias to giue him any aſſiſtance: Wherefore hee ſent Embaſſadors vnto him to promiſe all ſubiection and obedience; and hee ſent for preſents, a long robe or ſacerdotall cloake of gold, ſet with pearle and precious ſtones, certaine plumes of blacke Herrons, adorned with precious ſtones, a Turkiſh ſword, the ſcabberd being of ſiluer richly ſet with iewels, tenne blacke horſes with rich furniture embroidered with gold and ſiluer, and a Turkiſh horſe hauing halfe the body and legges of the colour of gold, with his furniture of crimſon richly imbroidered. He laboured to haue the Emperour giue notice to the Baſſa of BVDA that this attempt of the Turkes againſt TRANSYLVANIA was againſt the articles of peace: but the Baſſa made anſwere, That his Emperour was not to bee blamed, if hee ſeized vpon that prouince which did immediatly belong vnto him, and kept it quiet from the practiſes of others. But Battori relying not wholly vpon this ſupport, but deſiring to haue more ſtrings to his bowe, ſent Embaſſadours to the Sultan, with rare and rich preſents, who had ſecret treaties and counſells with the Baſſaes, the which Negronius the Emperours Embaſſadour reſiding at CONSTANTINOPLE diſcouering, hee ſent word vnto the Emperour, that he entertained a monſter among men. Battori ſends an Embaſſador to the Emperor Matthias.

About the ſame time there came Embaſſadours from the Saxon townes of TRANSYLVANIA,

VANIA, complaining much of the crueltie and tyrannie of Battori. The Saxons (ſaid they) liuing many yeares in TRANSYLVANIA, had beawtified the Prouince with Townes, Villages, and Markets, and had by their vertue obtained many priuiledges from former Emperours; but Battori (againſt his promiſed faith, and the oath which he had taken) had depriued them of their priuiledges, and afflicted them in ſuch ſort, as they were in a manner ruined: that from his firſt entrance he had ſought to root out the auncient familie of the Saxons: that he had afflicted them with impriſonments and miſerable ſeruitude, and had detained Iohn Benner three yeeres in priſon, for no other cauſe, but for that he knew he had brought a great eſtate out of GERMANIE; he had depriued honeſt Widdowes of their eſtates, and had oppreſt others with vniuſt exactions: he had ſurprized HERMSTAD the chiefe Citie of the Saxons, and ſuffred the Haiduks to ſpoile it, and to commit all ſorts of inſolencies. That hee had expelled the Magiſtrate, baniſhed honeſt citizens, rauiſhed women, ſlaine the parents to depriue the children of their inheritance, and committed all the barbarous cruelties that could be deuiſed. That he had ſent 300 captiues to the Sultan for a preſent; many he cut into ſmall peeces, ſome he had throwne downe from the tops of mountaines and towers, ſome he had hung vp by the feet, others he had drawne in pieces with horſes and trees, and to conclude, he had practiſed all kinds of barbarous cruelties. That hauing expelled religious princes out of MOLDAVIA and VALACHIA, he had made them ſubiect to the Turke, for no other end, but getting an occaſion to circumuent the Chriſtians, he might waſte all with fire and ſword, hauing multitudes of Barbarians to ſecond him, and for a concluſion of his notable crueltie, hauing freed the towne of GAVDIN, he made choice of twentie of the principall inhabitants, and deliuering to euerie one of them a Pike, he forced them in his preſence to kill one another in the midſt of the market place.

Crueltie of Battori.

G H I

But God reuengeth his exceſſe by his ruine, whereinto wee ſhall preſently ſee him runne headlong miſerably: For Bethlem Gabor his capitall enemie, hauing ioyned his forces with thoſe of Baſſa Serder, they both entred together into TRANSYLVANIA, forced LVGATSI, take DEVE, and ſtrike a terrour into the whole countrey. Ogli Baſſa on the other ſide ſurmounts the difficultie of the wayes, and lodgeth with his troups in the ſuburbes of CROMSTAD, and from thence went and camped ouer all the tract of BARRY or BARSAC. Thus Battori ſees himſelfe preſt by an enemie from whom he can expect nothing but his miſerie and ruine; he attended ſuccours from the Emperour, vnder the conduct of the Palatine of HVNGARIE and Fortgatſi: they came, but not ſuch as were able to reſiſt the Turke. This made him write to Trinau for the leuying of ſouldiours; but the hatred they bare him, generally deceiued his hopes, no man would march vnder his enſignes. This refuſall makes him diſtruſtfull, hee dares not conferre with any man touching the affaires of the warre. A treatie of peace ſeemes more fit for his affaires, he makes an ouerture to his moſt familiar friends, and tels them that he holds it neceſſarie to purchaſe his peace with Sarder Baſſa at what price ſoeuer, yea, were it in deliuering into his hands the places of greateſt importance. But he receiues no other anſweres from them, but that they had rather die than aduiſe him to it. Thus he ſees himſelfe void of all hope of ſafetie in his affaires; he wanted money, his ſubiects, yea euen his ſouldiours hated him, as a prince abandoned to all crueltie, and for his laſt remedie, and the moſt ordinarie in baſe and cowardly minds, he fell into deſpaire, intreating one of his ſeruants to kill him; but the other refuſed him that honour, ſuffering him to draw on his miſerable life, vntill that within ſome few dayes after going forth to view where his troupes were lodged, being in an open chariot, accompanied onely with two gentlemen, fiftie of his ſouldiours (which attended him in the ambuſh) ſhot at him, ſlew him, & hurt thoſe that did accompany him. It is true, this accident hapned in the yeare 1613, when as this infortunate Battori went to giue an account vnto God, of the bad gouernment of his eſtate.

Some few dayes after, Bethlem Gabor was declared prince of TRANSYLVANIA by Baſſa Sarder, who gaue him this aduertiſement at his introduction; Battori ſhall ſerue for an example to badde princes; I doe not thinke that you will follow his ſteppes. Beware you attempt not any thing without the priuitie of my maſter: Maintaine peace with your neighbours, and make men of experience and honeſtie of your counſell. TRANSYLVANIA did yet feare the continuance of a ſtorme of a fatall warre, when as in leſſe than fortie dayes it ſaw it ſelfe ſetled in the calme of ſweet peace, by the acknowledgement which all the townes made vnto Bethlem Gabor, and the

But the desire of peace, and the feare of the Turkes armies, drew all the Gouernours of townes to acknowledge Gabor: Such were the affaires of TRANSYLVANIA, disordered by the Turke. Let vs now make an end of the remainder of the yere 1612, the which we haue deferred, for that we would not interrupt the relation of the affaires of this prouince.

We haue said elsewhere, that the king of PERSIA had offered conditions of peace to Sultan Achmat, much to his aduantage, seeing that he yeelded himselfe the Turkes tributarie, in regard of certaine lands which he had conquered from them. Now the Visier Nassuf Gene- A Persian Embassador comes to Constantinople
B rall of the armie against the Persian, brings his Embassadour to CONSTANTINOPLE, to conclude this peace. Nassuf arriued with his armie and the Persian Embassador at SCVDARET, right ouer against CONSTANTINOPLE, whither most of the Bassaes of the Port went to salute him, and then returned; but the Graund Visier stayed there two dayes: on the third he past ouer to CONSTANTINOPLE, where hee was entertained at the water side by all the Bassaes which accompanied him, an infinite number of Ianizaries going before with their pieces, and some of them in armour, after whom followed their Aga on horsebacke; then came a great number of Iamoglans, and the Emirs or kindred of Mahomet with their green Turbants, with many blind men shouting aloud: these holy men caried the banner (as they say) of Mahomet, and the people standing by, kissed it with great deuotion as they past; after
C them came the Chaoux on horsebacke, the Bassaes, then the chiefe Muphti, and last of all Nassuf Bassa himselfe: after whom followed the treasure which he brought with him for the Emperour, being two hundred thirtie foure mules loaden with gold and siluer. The Visier as he past by the Sultans window bowed himselfe verie low vnto him, from whom hee had a nod with his head, and so set spurres to his horse, and rode away fast, as the manner of the Turkes is, when they salute a greater man than themselues, presently to runne or ride away apace. The Visier being come to the Seraill, went in to the Sultan to kisse his hand, where he continued a whole houre, the rest of the Bassaes attending without. There were present at this dayes pompe, the Emperours Embassadour, the French, the English, Polonian, Lowe Countries, and Venetian, the Persian remaining still at SCVDARET. The graund Visier as he D past by the Emperours Embassadour, put off his hat and saluted him, but not the rest. The same day Tomsho, who had beene lately made prince of MOLDAVIA by the Graund Seignior, sent many Polonians to CONSTANTINOPLE, whom hee had taken in the warres: All which (notwithstanding they threw down their caps, and offred to turne Turks) were put to death. And within few daies after, the Visier Nassuf sitting in the publike Diuan, had three robes sent him from the grand Seignior, to grace him.

Achmat hauing a will to let the Persian see the magnificence of his Court, went out of CONSTANTINOPLE, and vnder a pretext to go take the aire at his countrie pallace, called Darut Bassa, he takes occasion at his returne to make a stately entry at his Imperiall citie. The generall Surueyor being aduertised of his will, caused the wayes from this pallace of Darut
E vnto the citie, to be couered with sand, the which containes two French leagues, or foure English miles. This done, the Emperour parted for his returne, and entred in pompe into CONSTANTINOPLE. The order of this entry was in this manner: A great number of men at armes marched first on horsebacke, and after them some troupes of foot, the Cadis of CONSTANTINOPLE, or men of Iustice, and all the Talismans, or they of Mahomets law, in verie great numbers followed after, and after these marcht the Visiers and Bassaes in great pompe: after whom followed the Sultans houshold, that is to say, tenne men leading in their hands tenne goodly horses richly caparisoned, the last of which had the bridle and saddle all couered with precious stones; the Sultans targer was made fast vnto the saddle, and vpon it did hang euen to the ground a great tassell of pearles: and ouer all this a long horse cloth or co-
F uering for a horse, the which was embroidered so thicke with pearle, as the ground could not be discerned: after which followed the rest of the Emperours houshold in diuers troupes: First, fiftie Ianizaries on foot, euery one leading dogges in leashes, mastiffes, or Irish greyhounds, the goodliest of all were those which the French Embassadour had presented vnto the Sultan. Secondly, the graund Seigniors footmen, called Peiks, Persians by nation, all well attired, wearing on their heads bonnets of siluer and guilt in forme of pots. Thirdly, threescore Archers on foot, in the middest of which the Sultan came, attired in a rich roabe of cloth of gold imbrodered with Pearles and Diamonds, his slaues were enricht after the same manner, his Turban couered with fiue plumes of black Herons feathers enricht with great Diamonds, and a chaine of the same stones about the lower part of his Turban: vpon his little finger he had a Diamond of a large bigneſſe and ineſtimable price, the which gaue a maruelous great light, he was proudly mounted vpon a goodly horſe richly caparisoned Emperourlike, the saddle was imbrodered with gold pearle and Diamonds, the stirrops of pure gold set with many Diamonds, and from the horse neck did hang a great tassell of pearle, the which were so great, as they were esteemed very rich and pretious. 4. After the graund Seigniour followed three men on horseback, carrying in their hands the one his armes, the other his cloke, and the third his Imperiall Turban, and these were attended on by certaine Esquiers and Gentlemen all on horseback. 5. Then came the Musick after the Turkish manner, consisting of threescore men on horseback, which plaied vpon Phises, Clerons, and trumpets. 6. There followed a hundred Pages of the Sultans, brauely mounted, and followed by many Eunukes, 50 of which Pages carried euery oue a Faulcon vpon his fist, hauing their heads inricht with Diamonds, and these were followed by thirtie guards of the Port. 7. fiftie Faulconers and huntsmen richly attired and well mounted, 4. whereof had either of them before him vpon his saddle bow a Leopard couered with cloth of gold. 8. A great number of other pages fairer then the pictures of Adonis or Loue, chosen amongst the infants of the tribute, and vnfortunately appointed for the filthie and vnnaturall pleasures of their master, whose garments after the Turkish manner were pretious, and made of rich cloth of gold curled. They were followed by a great troupe of yong men plainely attired in cloth, hauing vpon their heads yellow caps pointed in forme of a sugar loafe, and these were ordained to serue the Sultans pages.

Pages chosen among the fairest for the Sultans pleasure.

There were moreouer attending the Sultan in this pompe diuers Beglerbegs, as of Bosna, Byda, Romania, Natolia, and others, euery companie going distinct both of horse and foot, with the Bassaes seruants all gallantly attired and well mounted: and after them followed Nassufs atendants, being fiue hundred in number richly armed: there were also the kings firemen, Calkers, Azappes, the Rices or officers of gallies, with speares in their hands, all that belonged to the Arsenall; the Carters which gouerned the cartes going to warre, and their captaines, then the shot-men with their banner, and the Armourers all in armour, with their banner. There were also the Banners of the Graund Seignior, Mahomet, and of the Graund Visier euery one in his order before the Graund Seignior; and after all followed the Capigis, and officers of his kitchin. The number of all sorts of attendants in this pompe was so great, as it was esteemed to amount to the number of 40000 persons.

A largesse of the Persian embassador when as the Sultan past.

The Persian Embassador, for whose sake the Emperor Achmat had made this stately show, to the end he might carie backe into his countrey a patterne of the Ottoman state and greatnesse, caused to be cast out before his lodging, when as the Sultan past by, 100 pieces of silk, the which were gathered vp by the archers of his guard, whereof they made good purchase. All these magnificences added to those which we haue formerly related at the marriages of the Sultans sister and daughter, with other pompe celebrated in France, Spaine, Naples, and Germanie, for the mariages of Lewes the thirteenth king of France, with Anne of Avstria infant of Spaine, and of the prince of Spaine with the Ladie Elizabeth of Burbon, the kings eldest sister, and for the coronation of the Empresse, and the Emperours entrie into Nvremberg, may giue vnto this yeare 1612, the title of magnifique or stately.

Foure dayes after Sultan Achmats entrie into his imperiall citie, the Persian embassadour had audience, and was receiued to kisse his hands: he presented vnto his maiestie, in the behalfe of the king of Parsia his master, 400 balls of silke, a Besonard stone as big as a mans fist, with some others that were lesse, nine bags of leather full of Turquoises, the which were a foot and an halfe long, and aboue foure fingers broad, a great number of Tapistries of woll, silke cloth of gold and siluer, with many other things of great prize, and verie rare. The complements being ended, they began to treat seriously of a peace betwixt two great and ancient enemies, the Turke and the Persian; the which after some difficulties, was concluded vpon these conditions: That the Persian king should pay yearely vnto the Turkish Emperour by way of tribute a quantitie of silke to the burthen of 200 camels, that the king

A of PERSIA his ſonne ſhould bee called Baſſa of TAVRIS; and that the Cadi or ſoueraigne Iudge of that towne ſhould be ſent from CONSTANTINOPLE. This peace thus concluded to the Turks aduantage, the Perſian Embaſſadour returned vnto his maſter, hauing left moſt of his traine dead of the plague at CONSTANTINOPLE. Being arriued at TAVRIS, the king of PERSIA ſeeing this peace to be ſo diſhonorable, and burthenſome for him, he cauſed this Embaſſadors head to be cut off; and ſent backe the Chiaux, who was come from CONSTANTINOPLE, to ſee him ſweare the peace. Some write that he did him ſome indignities, which made theſe two great monarchs returne againe to armes.

B The graund Viſier Naſſuf after his returne to CONSTANTINOPLE, to ſhew his great power and authoritie, procured meanes to haue the Chimacham, (who had formerly ſupplied the place of the graund Viſier in the abſence of Amurath Baſſa, and vntill the returne of Naſſuf) to be depriued of his Baſſaes place, and ſent preſently ouer vnto SCVDARET, vnder pretence of preferring him to a gouernment neere vnto TREBIZOND in the confines of Turkie, but with an intent to depriue him of his head. The friends of this Chimacham, (who were many and great in court) ſeeing him ſo diſgracefully ſent away, and doubting Naſſufs purpoſe, procured leaue from the Grand Seignior to haue him ſent for backe againe, for that hee was an old man, and might from thenceforth liue at home in quiet; and for his former ſeruices a thouſand aſpers a day allowed him for his entertainement: which Naſſuf tooke verie diſcontentedly.

C During the Perſian Embaſſadours abode at CONSTANTINOPLE, the Emperour Matthias (ſucceſſour to Rodulphus his brother) ſent an Embaſſadour to the Sultan, to complaine of the enterpriſes which were made daily vpon TRANSYLVANIA, a prouince which hee ſaid belonged vnto him, as a dependance of his realme of HVNGARIE. This Embaſſadour called Negroni was receiued at the Court, and admitted to kiſſe the Sultans hand: but his preſents were little eſteemed, for that they were of leſſe value than thoſe which they had lately receiued from the Perſian. His demaunds to haue the prouince of TRANSYLVANIA, were grounded vpon an article inſerted among thoſe of the peace betwixt the Emperour and Botskay, at that time choſen prince of TRANSYLVANIA; that is to ſay: That Botskay dying without iſſue male, TRANSYLVANIA ſhould remaine at the diſpoſition of his Imperiall Maieſtie. This article being read by Negroni in the Turkes Counſell, whither he had been admitted: the Muphti or ſoueraigne prieſt of Mahomets law anſwered, That it was contrarie to his law: ſo the demaunds of this Embaſſadour touching TRANSYLVANIA were reiected, ſeeing that Botskay had no power from the Sultan (ſaid the graund Viſier) to treat with the Emperour, and to giue him TRANSYLVANIA after his death. Negroni grounded this gift of Botskay (mentioned in the ſaid article) vpon the eight article of the peace betwixt the Turke and the Emperor, concluded in the Iſle of Dannow, by Amurath Viſier, and the deputies of his Imperiall Maieſtie, in theſe words, That all which had beene graunted in the treatie of peace made at VIENNA to Botskay, ſhould bee duely and faithfully obſerued. Naſſuf the graund Viſier replied, That the Baſſa Amurath being then Viſier, might erre in ſigning theſe articles of the peace vpon the Dannow: and at the ſame inſtant hee ſhewed foorth ſome other Articles, whereas that was not inſerted, ſaying, That the Sultan would faithfully performe thoſe and no others, preſſing the Embaſſador Negroni to ſigne them, the which he refuſed to doe; ſo as Naſſuf vſed ſome threats to terrifie him; but Negroni replied, That he was in their power, and that in this caſe he had rather looſe his life, and die glorioufly for the good of his maſters affaires, than to haue it taken from him at his returne to VIENNA with ſhame and infamy, hauing ſigned thoſe articles. Finally hee promiſed to aduertiſe his Imperiall maieſtie, and to certifie them of his pleaſure: which promiſe for this time ended the contention.

The Emperour Matthias ſendes an Embaſſador to Conſtãtinople

The malice and falſhood of the Turkes.

In the beginning of this yeare, Sultan Achmat, after the reception of the Perſian Embaſſadour, and the ſtately entrie he made into CONSTANTINOPLE, went to lie at ADRIANOPLE, where his Ianizaries and Spahies began to mutinie, ſpurning at their bread and rice which was giuen them for their daily entertainement: and being demaunded the reaſon of this their inſolencie, they anſwered, That no Emperour before him had ſo carried out his men in the depth of Winter: which anſwere did much incenſe Naſſuf Baſſa. This Viſier was in ſuch credit with the Graund Seigniour, as during his abode at

ADRIANOPLE, hee came three times in perſon priuately to viſite him, who grewe ſo G powerfull ouer his maſters affections, as hee obtained a priuiledge, That it might not bee lawfull for any man to ſpeake with the Graund Seigniour priuately, but himſelfe. Being returned to CONSTANTINOPLE, there happened a great fire, in which there were fiue hundred houſes burnt. The Viſier Naſſuf comming to ſee it quenched, and finding ſome Ianizaries more carefull to breake open lockes, and rifle ſhoppes, than to doe any good ſeruice, hee ſtrucke out the braines of one of them with his mace, and brake the arme of another.

It had been an auncient cuſtome in CONSTANTINOPLE, that the owner of the houſe with all his familie where the fire began, ſhould be put to death for their negligence: But H it happening that the Emperours owne Serraill, in the time of Mahomet father to Achmat, being ſet on fire, Cicala Baſſa preſented a petition vnto him, that this cuſtome might bee aboliſhed; holding it vniuſt that other men ſhould bee put to death, and the ſame let paſſe in the Emperours owne houſe: whereunto he yeelded, holding it reaſonable. And ſoone after there happened another great fire, at which the Viſier cauſed many Ianizaries to bee hanged, finding them too buſie in rifling houſes; and hee went vp and downe the ſtreets with his Cemiter in one hand, and a Ianizaries head in the other, which he had cut off. The Graund Seigniour ſent holy water vnto the Viſier, wherein hee had dipt a piece of Ma- homets garment, the which being powred into the fire, the Turkes ſaid, it ceaſed pre-ſently; yet by the report of viſible witneſſes, it burned foure houres after. The graund I Viſier Naſſuf was a cruell enemie to the Ianizaries, of whom hee ſent ſixteene thouſand away into ASIA, and would not ſuffer any moe to bee made, but onely Spahies: and ouer ſuch Ianizaries as remained hee made his owne ſeruants to bee Churbagies, and Agaes or Captaines ouer fifties and hundreds, fortifying himſelfe by all the meanes hee could deuiſe, againſt the future time, to preuent his ſudden ruine; but all this could not pre-ſerue him from a ſhamefull fall, as you ſhall hereafter heare.

Troubles in the realme of Fez and Moroco.

In the meane time let vs paſſe vnto AFFRICKE, to obſerue the troubles which fell in the realmes of FEZ and MOROCO, the quarrels betwixt prince Xerif Muley Cidan, and the Xerif Muley Achmet, Ben-Abdalla his nephew, and the victories of Cidan againſt Abdalla. The family of the Xerifs princes of FEZ and MOROCO, tooke its beginning ſome 104 yeares ſince, from K
Mahomet Xerif, borne at TIGVMEDET in DARA, at this preſent one of the prouinces of MO-ROCO: he was Alfaqui or preacher of Mahomets law, who ſeeing the deuiſions betwixt the

The beginning of the Xerifs of Fez & Moroco ſouereigne princes of thoſe realmes, and that the Portugals had ſeiſed of the chiefe Forts of MOROCO, he began with three of his ſonnes, Abdalla, Hamet, and Mahomet, to lay the foundation of a new monarchie, ſupported by three pillars. That is to ſay, by a counterfeit pietie and diſguiſed religion; vpon a godly pretext to make warre againſt the Portugals Chriſti-ans, which were in AFFRICKE; and vpon a paſſionate deſire to retire the Mahometan Moores which were in their pay, to the end they might by that meanes weaken them, and chaſe them with more eaſe out of the territories of MOROCO. The king who at that time held the ſcepter of FEZ (ſeeing nothing but the outſide of the Xerifs deſignes) ſuffered his three ſonnes L to diſplay their ſtanderd againſt the Chriſtian Portugalls in the realme of MOROCO: Innouations and nouelties are commonly pleaſing to the common people. At this beginning

The children of the Xerif grow potent.

theſe three Leaders were followed by a great number of ſouldiours; they vanquiſhed in many incounters, and the bruit of their new victories flying into the realme of MOROCO, retired the Moores from the Portugalls ſeruice, whom they defeated ſoone after, with their commaunder Lopes Barriga. True it is, that it was to their loſſe; for Abdalla the eldeſt of theſe three brethren loſt his life in this combat. But they ſeiſed vpon the great towne of TARA-DENTE in the prouince of SVS, and of the prouinces of HERRA, IDEVACA, VBIDEVACA, CVS, GVZVLE, and in a manner of the whole countrie betwixt MOROCO and mount ATLAS, ſetling their principalitie in TARADENTE, whereas the Xerif their father carried the name of the gouer- M nour of the prouince of SVS.

They kill the king of Moroco.

The King of MOROCO fearing the greatneſſe of theſe new conquerours, diſſembled the deſire he had to bring them vnder, aſſuring himſelfe that time would preſent him ſome good occaſion: ſo ſuffering them to enter into MOROCO: but they preuented him, they tooke

away his life by poiſon, and ſeized vpon his realme. The king of Fez, who had by an indiſcreet ſimplicitie ſuffered them to take armes, and by that meanes to open the way to a great fortune, he ſaw afarre off the tempeſt of theſe vniuſt ſpoilers to fall vpon Moroco and other places. The feare of the like calamitie did much afflict his mind: but the Xerifs entertained this idle prince with faire ſhewes; they abuſed his bountie, and with the fourth part of the rich ſpoiles which they had taken in ſo many townes and prouinces, they lull his diſtruſt aſleep: moreouer, they ſend him the tribute due for the realm of Moroco. Hamet takes vpon him the name of king of Moroco, Mahomet that of king of Svs, in the towne of Taradentes; and by a good intelligence betwixt them, they make themſelues fearefull to all thoſe countries, ſo as they haue nothing more to feare, than the threats and vengeance of heauen. They then began to contemne the king of Fez, and plainely to denie the tribute of Moroco, pretending for their reaſon, that they were iſſued from the line of Mahomet. This contempt made the king of Fez to open his eyes; he finds the faults paſt by the intreſt of the preſent; he ſees the Xerifs had abuſed the libertie which he had giuen them, whereupon he went to field with an armie of 18000 men, and planted his ſiege bufore Moroco; but as his enemies partie was ſtronger than his, ſo he was chaſed away, & his armie defeated at the paſſage of a riuer. Thus the Xerifs became peaceable poſſeſſors of Moroco. The peace of the countrey made theſe men idle, and idleneſſe drew the two brethren into quarrell; they muſtred vp their forces, and came to fight, where after two bloudie battels, Mahomet being victor, he tooke his elder brother Hamet, depriued him of his realme and libertie, and made him end his daies miſerably in priſon. Thus God doth puniſh the vniuſt ſpoiler of another mans good: we ſhall ſee in their poſteritie the continuance of the ſame quarrell.

The king of Fez begins to feare them.

The king of Fez beſiegeth Moroco, and is defeated.

Quarrels betwixt the Xerifs, and the eldeſt taken by his brother.

Mahomet ſetled ſoueraigne in Moroco by blood and fratricide, as monſtrous in ambition as in crueltie, he turned the ſame armes wherewith hee had beaten and vanquiſhed his eldeſt brother, againſt the king of Fez, (whoſe improuidence had ſuffered Mahomet and his brethren to take armes vnder the deceitfull title and pretence of making war againſt the Chriſtian Portugals) he aſſaulted him with great forces, vanquiſhed him, tooke him priſoner, and depriued him both of realme and life. Thus the Xerifs in the perſon of this Mahomet became ſoueraigne princes of Fez and Moroco. The victorie ſo happily gotten of ſo many nations made him fearfull; but by his crueltie he drew vpon his deſcendents the iuſt iudgment of him who puniſheth the exceſſe and enormitie of crimes vnto the fourth generation. His poſterity was miſerable, the vniuſt deſire of raign (one ruining another) entertained the brethren in perpetuall diſcord. For Cidan now king of Fez and Moroco, was lately expelled by his brother Kequi, but afterwards fortune changing her inconſtant fauour, Kequi was purſued by Cidan, defeated and forced in the yeare 1610 to ſaue his life in Algarbe in Portvgal. Abdalla the ſonne of Kequi ſeeing his fathers affaires thus deſolat, retires himſelfe towards the mountaines in the prouince of Svs, where finding opportunitie to annoy his vncle Cidan, he made daily incurſions vpon his territories, with ſome troups of Arabians, who had ioined with him being 200 horſe and 200 foot. But finding this to be a long courſe to attaine vnto the conqueſt of the realme, from whence he had bin expelled: he bethought himſelfe that ſome certaine counterfet fictions in religion, had in former times brought in his grandfather, & made him abſolute lord of a great country; wherfore he made vſe of a propheſie forged in his ambitious ſpirit, and to worke an impreſſion in the peoples minds (eaſie to be moued with a paſſion of religion) he ſent certaine religious Mahometans throughout the country, with a ſhew of holy ſimplicitie, who went preaching from place to place, that one Falquere a man of holy life, had giuen vnto a ſonne of his a Drumme of an admirable power and vertue, commaunding him expreſſely to keepe it carefully, vntill that a prince called Abdalla ſhould come into Moroco, being expelled by the iniuſtice of his owne blood: and that then hee ſhould beat this drumme, and that the people at the ſound thereof, might go to the warre with all ſafetie; that it ſhould be helpefull to them, giue peace vnto the realme, and ſettle all the cuſtomes and ancient lawes to their common content. Thus they preached this propheſie, the which they ſaid was now accompliſhed, ſeeing that this propheticall drumme had beene found, that Abdalla the eldeſt prince of the houſe of the Xerifs had cauſed it to bee beaten, exhorting all men to follow the warre for the common good of the countrey.

The Xerif aſſaults the king of Fez.

Cidan and Kequi brethren expell one another.

A propheſie inuented by Kequi, and preached by religious Turkes.

These vanities being preached by these ignorant and malicious religious Turks, increa- G sed the number of Abdallaes partie, whereof Cydan being aduertised, hee sent a great armie against him into the prouince of Svs, vnder the commaund of Alcas Elmye, to hinder the progresse of his designes: but Abdalla finding these forces to approach, retired himselfe towards the mountaines, from whence hee might charge the enemies armie; the which hee did so happily, as within few dayes he cut off fiue thousand of his men. This successe did so Abdalla defea- aduance his affaires, as his troupes increased daily, so as Cidan was forced to goe with new ted and slaine forces to fight with him, the which was the cause of his ruine: for at this time hee was inuenotwithstan- sted, and notwithstanding the good successe of his false prophesies, lightly grounded vpon ding his false the sound of a drumme, hee was defeated and slaine in this yeare one thousand fixe hundred H prophesies. and twelue.

Gotardus discoursing of this miraculous king of Mavritania, whom hee calles Muley
The miraculous Hamet, writes that hee was charmed with deuillish incantations, and freed from all out-king of Mau- ward force, carrying himselfe for a diuine prophet; That with one hundred and eighritania. tie horse, and two hundred foot, hee went to make head against Cydan king of Moroco, hauing fortie thousand men: That his souldiours (who were so few in number) being readie to flye, hee persuaded them with a cunning speech to prepare to fight: That comming neere to Cidans campe, they might see a great armie of enemies fighting against them, in which there were fiue thousand of Cidans armie ouerthrowne, and the rest put to flight, and yet Hamet had not aduaunced with his troupes: That within few dayes after, I comming with his troupes tyred to a riuer side, hee commaunded them not to drinke nor wash in that riuer, which if they did, they would die: but some neglecting his commaund, thinking to quench their thirst, dyed suddenly. Hee tooke many places in those mountainous regions, which no man had formerly subdued; his forces increasing daily, hauing Cidan king of 25000 men, and vowing to goe against the Christians, more came vnto him: so as he went Fez ouer- against Cidan with a good armie, who likewise attended him. Hamet persuaded his souldiors throwen. that no shot could hurt them; so as they assaulted Cidans campe with such furie, as within lesse than an houres space they had slaine aboue fixe thousand men, and put the rest to flight. They write that Hamet lost not aboue foure or fiue, and that such as were strucke with any bullet, shewed markes, but no wounds; and that the great ordnance either shot K ouer them, or the powder vented out at the touch-hole, and wrought no effect. Cidan hauing lost his brother in the fight, fled with all his treasure, to recouer new forces, and in the meane time Hamet made himselfe master of the whole countrey. There were certaine Hollanders admitted vnto him, whom they found sitting vpon a carpet made of the barke of trees, hauing a white shirt, and a long garment vpon it, a red cap on his head, bare thighs, and red shooes, a bag about his necke, and in it hee hid his Alcaron, a short crooked sword and a dagger hanging by him. Being saluted by the Hollanders, hee willed them to sit downe by him, telling them that hee was sent from heauen, to purge the world from euill, and to prepare the law of God; to expell Cidan out of his kingdome, and to restore peace vnto the world: wherefore he aduised them not to haue any commerce with Cidan, nor to L assist him in any sort. They obserued many markes vpon his bodie, he had one blew tooth, all the rest being white, haire vpon either shoulder, a red circle in the palme of his right hand, and the proportion of a spurre vpon his right foot. Hauing gotten some victories against Cidan, and taken the towne of Moroco, in the end his deuillish art failing him, hee was slaine as you haue heard. Such were the affaires of Affricke, in the realmes of Fez and Moroco.

A great drought But in Algier a wonderfull drought had caused cruell combustions, it had so deuoured and sterilitie the fruits of the earth before their maturitie, as there followed a wonderfull famine through at Algier. out the whole land. The Turks attributed the cause of their miserie sometimes to their sins, then to the comming of the Moores, who had beene expelled out of Spaine, as a pernici- M ous vermine, and sometimes to the licentiousnesse of Christians, which liued in those places.
Wherefore in the beginning of May this yeare, the Iudge of the towne ordained, That all the Turkes should make their deuout prayers to Mahomet their prophet to obtaine raine, so necessarie in that country; That the Moores should depart the town within three daies vpon

A paine of death; and that all the Chriſtians, as well free as bond-ſlaues, ſhould cauſe their heads and their beards to be ſhauen, this was ſpeedily executed; for the Turks decrees require a prompt obedience. But the miſerable Moores which could not get out of ALGIER within their three dayes prefixed, detained either by ſickeneſſe, or ſome other impediment, were all cut in pieces. For thirteene dayes, there was nothing ſeene within the towne but proceſſions of Turkes without Turbants, crying and howling after their manner to obtaine raine from their falſe prophet: But hee which commaunds ſoueraignetie ouer times, from whoſe hand proceedes faire weather and raine, and which makes the earth fruitfull, held the pipes of heauen yet ſtopped, to open them at more religious and holy vowes than the ſu-
B perſtitious clamours of theſe infidells. For Bernard Murroy, of the order of the Redemption of captiues, hearing that the Turkes meant to reuenge their miſeries vpon them, and to ruine a little Chappell which the Chriſtian ſlaues had in the priſon, for the pious exerciſes of their Religion, obtained (by the meanes of Bius Conſull of the French in ALGIER) permiſſion from the Douan, or Turkiſh Iudge, to make proceſſions, and to pray vnto God to ſend them the deawe of heauen, which was ſo neceſſarie for them. All the chriſtian ſlaues which were priſoners, continued their deuotions for the ſpace of fiue dayes: But on the fourth day being the eight of May, there fell ſuch abundance of raine vpon ALGIER, as theſe poore Chriſtians ſeeing their prayers heard in the midſt of the enemies of their faith, gaue infinit thanks vnto God for his great mercy and grace.

Proceſſions of the Turkes.

The deuout praiers of the Chriſtians obtaine raine.

C Theſe miſerable Chriſtian ſlaues were ſtill detained in yrons and cruell ſeruitude, by this accident; This Murroy of the Order of the Redemption of captiues, accompanied with two others of the ſame Order, had redeemed to the number of one hundred thirtie and ſixe: but when hee was readie to imbarke them, their euill fortune would haue it, that the gallies of GENOA running along that coaſt, landed ſome men neere vnto ALGIER, where they tooke the Baſſaes ſonne of that towne, with many other Turks, and amongſt this number a virgin of ALGIER, of a verie noble familie, and of as rare a beautie for the miſerie of theſe ſlaues, that when as the Baſſaes ſonne and the others were redeemed by a Fregat which the father had ſent, the faire Algerian virgine was ſtill detained by a captaine of the Genowayes, who had retyred to CALVY an Iſland
D adioyning, there to ſatisfie his deſires with more eaſe, vpon the fraile and fading perfection of this faire ſlaue, which had depriued him of his libertie. In the meane time the Baſſa of ALGIER ſeeing his ſonne returned with the other Turkes, and not the Algerian virgine, commaunded that the 136 ſlaues ſhould bee put againe into yrons, with the three religious men which had redeemed them. Thus this feminine beautie, or rather the paſſion of this Genoways, who holdes the poſſeſſion ſo deare, makes a great number of Chriſtian ſoules to ſuffer by in ſupportable ſeruitude, howſoeuer they of his nation (flattering his diſordered luſt) ſay that his deſire to winne her to God, and to make her a Chriſtian, cauſed him to keepe her ſo carefully.

Theſe ſuffered in ALGIER the loſſe of their libertie: But a Capuchen Frier, a Florentine
E by nation, indured at TVNES the loſſe of his life, by the crueltie of the Moores chaſed out of SPAINE, and retired into thoſe countries. This religious man being a ſlaue among the Turkes, attended daily from FLORENCE, or from ſome other place, money to redeeme his libertie: But it happened one day diſputing in a Barbers houſe with a Moriſque, concerning Chriſtian Religion, the zeale of his faith tranſported him ſo farre, as to ſay among diuers Turkes, that his Religion was better than that of Mahomets. Theſe wordes tooke crimonouſly in that place, were reported by the Moriſques to the Cadi or Iudge of the towne, whom they preſt with ſuch horrible clamors and cries, as he pronounced ſentence of death againſt this Capuchen. Hee was deliuered vnto them, and they ſtripped him naked, leading him with infamie through TVNES, ſome ſpitting in his face, others caſting durt at F him, and ſo they ledde him out of the towne, where they tyed him vnto a poſt, and they being cruelly incenſed by a ſpeach which a Morrabour or religious Turke ſaid vnto them, That hee among them that gaue him not one blowe with a ſtone, ſhould bee no good Turke, they ſtoned him to death, where afterwards they burnt his bodie, and threwe the aſhes into the winde.

A Capuchen of Florence in captiuitie at Tunes.

He dies gloriouſly for the faith.

An enterhrise of foure slaues.

The martyrdome of this Capuchen, was followed by the constant confession (amidst the violence of torments) of a penitent Renegado, a Florentine by nation, and captaine of the chiefe gallie of CHIO; Foure Frenchmen being slaues in the Island of CHIO, in the patron or chiefe gallie, belonging to the Bey or Gouernor of the Island, they resolued to recouer their libertie with the hazard of their liues, to returne into FRANCE, and carrie into some port of Christendome that gallie, being the best appointed in the whole hauen. They drew vnto their partie the Captaine which commaunded being a Florentine Renegado. Their enterprise should haue beene executed, when as they should goe to land to cut wood. But whether that the scribe were treacherous to his companions or transported with some rash indiscretion, being on land, hee spake these words aloud, the which ouerthrew both the desigue, and them that proiected it; Hoe, wee shall returne into Christendome. A Turke which was neere taking hold of these wordes, reported them vnto the Patron, who presently layd hold vpon the scribe, and drew from him the confession of all the enterprise. Hee presently sends an hundred men towards the gallie, to seize vpon the foure French slaues, and the captaine. But these fiue made such a generous resistance, as if the other slaues, who were for the most part Moldauians, or of the prouinces which border vpon the blacke sea, had had the courage to fight for their libertie, without doubt the Frenchmens enterprise had succeeded happily. But what could fiue men doe against an hundred? yet they slew fifteene, and wounded many: the foure Frenchmen were all slaine, and the Florentine captaine was taken aliue, and reserued to the rigour of a cruell death. For they continued him sixe houres together in most violent torments, he still calling vpon the holy and sacred name of Iesus Christ, euen to the last gaspe, and detesting the errours and falshood of the law of Mahomet. This happened in October this yeare.

The vnited Estates send an Embassador to Constantinople

A little before, the Estates of the vnited Prouinces, and Count Maurice seeing the losses which the shippes of HOLLAND suffred in the Mediterranean sea, many of them being taken by the Turkish gallies, and a great number of their men made slaues: to the end they might bee freed from that daunger, and haue a safe passage for their ships, and procure libertie for their captiues, they resolued to make a league with the Turke. Wherefore they sent Cornelius Hage to CONSTANTINOPLE, who not onely willingly accepted of that Embassie, but performed it with such discretion, as hee purchased great credit and commendation to himselfe, and much profit to the prouinces; he had resolued at first to passe through HVNGARIE; but he found so many crosses & obstacles, by some that were creatures to the Pope and Spaniard, as he was forced to turne out of the way, and fetch a great circuit. First of all, he fell into the hands of the Archduke Ferdinand, who caused him to bee examined, and admonished to desist from his purpose: After which he was tost at sea, and in the end hauing surmounted all daungers, hee recouered CONSTANTINOPLE, the first of May. Hee had expresse charge from the vnited Estates to labour for three things. The first was, to treat of the deliuerance of the Hollanders that were slaues. The second, to make a league with the Turke. And the third, to obtaine from him a free nauigation for the Hollanders, throughout all the seas and ports of his empire.

This Embassadour was brought to kisse the Sultans hands, and was fauourably receiued; he presented vnto his maiestie in the name of the Estates of the vnited prouinces, his letters of Embassie, with the presents which follow: Three birds of Paradise of rare and precious plumes, wonderfull goodly to behold, and valued at eight hundred pound sterling: two vessels of Christall wonderfull rich and beautifull: foure other vessels made of fishes bones, whereas the art seemed miraculous in the grauing: fourtie pieces of cloth of gold of diuers colours: fiue pieces of silke, fiue of damaske, fiue of silke watered, and fiue plaine: A staffe of an Elephants tooth grauen with admirable industrie. A Parrat shut in a cage of Christall, so artificially done, as no man could discerne the entrie: and many faire and rich tableclothes of Holland cloth, most part powdered with flowers to the life, and wrought in their liuely colours. The which the Sultan did accept with admiration. All these things shew sufficiently, that the Estates from the beginning or soone after haue raised handiworks as well as traffike and nauigation to the highest point of perfection.

The sixt of Iulie following, the league was sworne betwixt the Ottoman Emperour, and the

A the vnited prouinces of the Low Countries, by the which Achmat promiſed to cauſe to bee ſet at libertie, all the Hollanders that were deteined ſlaues within his empire; that the traffike ſhould bee free for the Hollanders ſhippes throughout all his ſeas and hauens: and moreouer hee graunted, that the Eſtates ſhould haue an Embaſſadour reſiding at his Port. This alliance with the Turke, for the which they haue ſo often, and with little reaſon blamed the French, hath beene affected and ſought by the Engliſh and Spaniards, as we haue ſaid elſewhere; and now by the Hollanders, whoſe Eſtates proceed in all their affaires with ſuch weight and meaſure, as it ſeemes they doe nothing but with great reaſon, and to good purpoſe. A league betwixt the Turke and the Hollanders.

B About the end of this yeare, the Iewes whoſe long ſlauerie throughout the world reprocheth their wretched and miſerable obſtinacie, receiued at PERA neere CONSTANTINOPLE the weight of a furious tempeſt which fell vpon them, ſtirred vp againſt them by the malice of the Moriſques Granadines chaſed out of SPAINE, and retired into the Leuant. Theſe hauing by preſents wonne the fauour of the Cadi, or Iudge of the place, who was a Negro newly ſetled in that charge by the graund Viſier Naßuf; they obtained power from him, to thruſt all the Iewes out of PERA, and to ruine their Synagogues. This power they executed with all violence: And yet theſe miſerable Iewes durſt not make their complaints vnto the Magiſtrate, except one of their ſect which dwelt in the Iſle of CHIO, who being then at CONSTANTINOPLE, and ſuppoſing hee had more credit than the reſt, went to complaine to C this Cadi Negro, who preſently cauſed to bee giuen vnto him fiue hundred blowes with a cudgell, in ſtead of doing him iuſtice; ſo dangerous a thing it is to haue to doe with ſuch vniuſt Magiſtrates. The Moriſques chaſe the Iewes out of Pera.

The inſolences of the Moriſques, tranſported them further: for after they had expelled the Iewes out of their dwellings, they threatned to doe vnto the Chriſtians at PERA, as much as had been done vnto them in SPAINE: and they bragged, that they would ſeize vpon their Churches, and eſpecially of that of the Franciſcan Friers, the which was reaſonable faire for the place. But the French Embaſſadour, hauing made his complaint to the chiefe Viſier, he prohibited them to make any attempt againſt the Chriſtians, vpon paine of rigorous puniſhment. This prohibition ſtayed their furie: but they did not forbeare in all other occaſions D to ſhew the cruell hatred they owe vnto Chriſtians: ſo as throughout all the Leuant, in all incounters where they came, they doe a thouſand times more miſchiefe than the Turks themſelues. The preſſiſes of the Moriſques againſt the chriſtians of Pera.

At the ſame time the Sultan Achmat had drawen together a mightie armie to goe into TRANSYLVANIA; he cauſed it to campe in tents neere vnto CONSTANTINOPLE, about his palace called Darut Baſſa, whither the people of CONSTANTINOPLE went to walke, and to ſee his forces. within few dayes after he went to ADRIANOPLE; meaning from thence to proceed in his voiage, carrying with him all the chiefe men of his Port, except the Baſſa of the ſea, or Admirall, who remained at CONSTANTINOPLE, to haue a care of the citie. And for the greater ſafetie thereof, this Baſſa cauſed an Edict to bee publiſhed, That no man ſhould goe E out of his houſe, nor keepe any light in it after the ordinary crie, which is made an houre within night, when as the Taliſmans crying from the top of their Moſques, inuite the people to make the Sala, or prayer. After the publication of this ordinance, he ſent certaine Chaoux to intreat all the Embaſſadours reſiding at the Port, not to ſuffer their people to goe out by night, to the end that their libertie might not ſerue as a dangerous example to others. But notwithſtanding all the Baſſaes intreaties and prohibitions, three Engliſhmen of the Embaſſadours traine, went out by night into the ſtreet, where they were met by the Prouoſt of PERA, who tooke them, and preſently (without reſpect of the qualitie) cauſed either of them to to haue an hundred and fiftie blowes with a cudgell, and then committed them to priſon, the dores whereof are neuer opened but with a ſiluer key: ſo ſtrictly do they obſerue in Turkie F the orders of the princes lieutenants, without exception of perſons. The Turks army for Tranſiuania

About the end of the yeare the Patriarch of CONSTANTINOPLE (by reaſon of diuers complaints made againſt him) was depriued by the Graund Viſier, and one Cyrillus, Patriarch of ALEXANDRIA, (a learned and religious Biſhop) was (much againſt his will) preferred to the place. The former Patriarch hereupon excommunicated all ſuch as had wrought his ouer- A queſtion for the Patriarchſhip of Conſtantinople.

throw, but he himſelfe was baniſhed into the Iſle of RHODES. In his paſſage the Barke where- G in he went was caſt vpon MITILENE, in which place hee renounced all right and claime to the Patriarchſhip, before the Biſhop of that place, and reſigned it to the Biſhop of PA-TRAS: whereupon that Biſhop came from PATRAS to CONSTANTINOPLE, and labored with the Viſier Naſſuf for the place, who vpon promiſe to pay him fifteene thouſand Che-quines (which is ten thouſand more then they were wont to pay) made him a graunt thereof. Which Cyrillus the late elected Patriarch vnderſtanding, he came with all the Grecians to expoſtulate the buſineſſe with the Grand Viſier; who anſwered, that he was to doe what he could for the Emperours profit, and nothing againſt it, wherefore if they would giue ſo much as the other had promiſed, Cyrillus ſhould continue in the place: which the people were very H willing to performe, but Cyrillus refuſed it, and ſo the other was made Patriarke: who pre-ſently ſent for the old Patriarke to come from RHODES to make peace with him, for that they held his excommunication iuſt, being not depriued by a Counſell, but onely by the King.
About the ſame time Naſſuf the Graund Viſier ſent for the foure Embaſſadors of ENGLAND, FRANCE, VENICE, and the Eſtates of the Low Countries, and the reaſon why he ſent for them, was to raiſe their cuſtome one in the hundred more then the Marchants had formerly paid.

The enterpriſe of the great Duke of Tuſkany vpon Agliman.

Whileſt that the Sultan Achmats armie drew neere to TRANSYLVANIA, and fortified the places which he held in thoſe Countries, Coſmo de Medicis great Duke of TVSCANIE bent his generous deſignes againſt the fort of AGLIMAN in CARAMANIA, in old time called SILICIA, a Prouince, which in the writings of Auntients hath beene honoured with two fa- I mous cities, that is to ſay, THARSIS, the countrey of Saint Paul, and SELEVCIA, the fort and port wherof is called AGLIMAN, a hauen which in old time hath contained within its boſome the moſt fearefull forces of the Pirats of thoſe dayes: from thence in former times hath come forth a powerfull armie of Pirats, with 1000 ſaile, ſo proudly rigged, as many of them had their ſailes of purple, the tackling of gold threed, and the oares garniſhed with ſiluer, markes of the ſpoiles of aboue foure hundred cities ruined by thoſe pirats, who ſtroke a terror euen to the Romanes, and forced them, to auoid their furie, to ſet to ſea that great fleet whereof Pompey the great was Generall.

the great Duke to ſtudie to haue his reuenge for this affront; and his deſire to abate the pride of the common enemie, eleuated his minde to generous enterpriſes. In the end of March this yeare 1613, hee armed ſix gallies vnder the commaund of the Admirall Inghirami, the which he manned with ſix companies of foot, commaunded by Iulio de Conty, called Mon-tano, Generall at land, beſides fortie knights of the order of Saint Stephen, and a good number of Gentlemen aduenturers, among the which was Don Petro de Medicis. This fleet parted from LIGORNE, and came to CIVITA VECCHIA: in the beginning of Aprill they tooke in many Noblemen and Gentlemen of FRANCE, which attended them, and would be pertаkers in the enterpriſe, the which were, the Earle of Candale eldeſt ſonne to the Duke of Eſper-non, Cipierre, Themines, De Vic, Montterrault, De la Tour, and his brother Boiſſiere, Villandre, L Vernegue, Du Pleſſis, De la Motte magnus, Auenes, Del Tour, Sainct Cyre, Monplaiſir and Loyres.

turned againe to their gallies, and ſailing towards the Eaſt, they incountred three veſſels like vnto their Caramouſſals, the which they ſet vpon and tooke; and about the fifteenth of May hauing ſcoured the Leuant ſeas, they reſolued to attempt AGLIMAN. Vpon the way they tooke a veſſell called Grippe, which inſtructed them of the eſtate of the fortreſſe: they vnfew dayes after, one of the ſaid gallies ſhould come out of the port of AGLIMAN, and goe to the Iſland of PAPPADVLA, to fetch a new maſt. Inghirami thought to preuent it, carrying his whole fleet thither, the which he laid cloſe in the iſland, to ſurpriſe the Turkiſh gallie; but it hauing diſcouered his fleet, put out to ſea, and with ſpeed returned to the port of AGLIMAN,

A to giue the alarum vnto the Countrey. Notwithſtanding the Chriſtians reſolued to aſſault it, they went with their fleet to the port CAVALIER, twelue miles from AGLIMAN, from whence they ſent a long Boat to diſcouer, the which brings them word that the whole countrie was in armes. Theſe newes might well haue daunted the courages of ſome that had bin leſſe generous, yet they paſſe on, and about three of the clocke in the morning they came neere the ſhore, being couered with the ſilence of the night, ſo as before ſix of the clock they had made their landing about a mile and a halfe from the port. The Seignior of Montanto, and the Earle of CANDALE with ſome few choice men landed firſt, to diſcouer a mile from the ſhore, they encountered the Turkiſh horſemen, yet notwithſtanding Montanto com-
B manded they ſhould finiſh their landing, leauing twentie men for the guard of euerie Gally.

The Chriſtians land at Agliman.

This fort of AGLIMAN is ſeated vpon a little pleaſant hill, which looks towards the South: It extends from the hill vnto the ſea ſhore: the forme is ovall; that part which is next to the Sea is altogether Meridionall, and the other which riſeth vpon the top of the hill, lookes towards the North. The walls are built of good ſtone and lyme, the which are fiue fadome high, and one broad. Within there was a wall drawne from the Eaſt to the Weſt, which deuides it into two vnequall parts, the which they enter by a port ſet in the midſt. The circuite of the wall is fortified with eight towres, whereof fiue be whole, and three are but halfe towres: thoſe which bee whole are of a ſquare forme, and haue fiue fadome in breadth on either ſide: the halfe towres haue the ſame greatnes on the one ſide, and halfe as much
C on the other; their height exceeds not the wall vnleſſe it be that which is built on the top of the hill, which is raiſed about eight foot aboue the wall. Within the place were aboue three hundred fighting men, with ſtore of victuals, munitions for warre, and many pieces of ordnance: without, there were an hundred horſe ſcouring vp and downe for the guard of the place: and within the port there were two gallies, a caramouſſall, and a Greeke brigandine, with ſome 150 fighting men. The order of the combat was diuided after this manner, by the Seignior Montanto Generall at land: For the principall port, and that of the retrait, he ſent two companies of foot, which were thoſe of the Admirals gallie, of the captaines gallie, and of S. Stephen, with the Petards, all vnder the charge of the Earle of Candale, who leading this foreward, diſcouered a corps de gard of Turkes horſe and foot together, whereof he preſent-
D ly aduertiſed the Generall, ſending him word that he would march on towards the fort, and if the Turkes came to charge him, he would cut them all in pieces. Many aduiſed him to returne to the gallies: but Montanto allowed the reſolution of the Earle of Candale, who paſt on without charge vntill he came within 120 paces of the wall, where he was charged before by the musket ſhot of the fort, behind by the gallies, and in flanke by them of the mountaine, with ſuch horrible howling and crying out, as the mariners which carried the Petards being wonderfully amazed and terrified, let them fall to the ground, and fled away. The Baron of Mont-terault, and Tiel, a ſouldior of Languezа tooke them vp. They continued their way vntill they came within fifteene paces of the wals, when as twentie Turkes ſallied forth with a ſhew to make head againſt the Earle of Candales troupes: but ſeeing themſelues too
E weake, they fled preſently againe backe to the towne. The Earle aduaunced to enter with them, but the port was as ſoone ſhut as they were in: wherefore they muſt of force ſet the Petard to worke. But whileſt they were making it faſt vnto the gate, there fell a ſhowre of great ſtones vpon the troupe, wherewith Don Petro de Medicis (who would needs be preſent) was ouerthrowne and halfe ſlaine; Callonge, Mont-terault, La Tour, Dauenes, and Deltour had taken vpon them the charge of the Petard, euerie one carrying a part, to put it ſpeedily in execution.

The order giuen to aſſault the fort.

Whileſt they were thus buſied to force the Port, the Sergeant Maior came vnto the Earle of Candale and told him, that there was a troup of three hundred musketiers came to charge him: theſe were two Beys which came out of the gallies with their troups, by reaſon of the F bad guard which the two companies that Montanto had left to hinder their landing, had kept. The Earle of Candale had left part of his troupe with the Petard, and turned head with the reſt againſt theſe Beys to charge them; but they had no meaning to fight, but onely to make a ſhew, and ſeeing they ſhould be forced if they ſtayed longer, they tooke their way towards the mountaine, and in their retreat made many ſhot. The Chriſtians purſued them not, not, holding it fitter to returne to the petard, the which plaied ſo happily, as it made a breach capable for three men to enter in front. G

The Turkes retire to their towers and walles.

The ſquadron of the knights of S. Stephen, commaunded by the Commiſſarie Lenzong, and the companie of the gallies of S. Marie Magdalen, with two ladders were to aſſault the high tower. The companie of the Admirall gallie with one ladder, had charge to force the port of the retrait; and the companie of the gally of S. Iean was to fight with the gallies and veſſels in the hauen: all theſe troups (being led by the Generall Montanto, and by captaine Alexander of TARENTVM, Sargeant Maior) marched in order towards the fort. But the petard hauing effected as we haue ſaid, the Earle of Candale entred firſt with all his troupe, and ſuddenly ranne vnto the port of the retrait, there to applie a petard, the which alſo very fortunatly made a breach. The Turkes amazed at the noiſe and forcing of their gates, fled vnto their walles; ſome retiring into their towers, and others into the barracadoes which they had made in the ſtreet. At the ſame inſtant they planted two ladders on the lower part of the towne ſomewhat neere adioyning to the ſea, whereof one was broken with the loſſe of them that were vpon it: By the other (notwithſtanding that the Turkes horſemen charged them behind) a good number of Chriſtians got vp to the walles, making their way by their armes, whileſt that the reſt put the Turkes to rout: hauing taken their Cornet, they forced the reſt for to flie vnto the mountaines. The ſquadron of knights with the companie of the gallie of S. Marie, hauing had a longer way to march, came not to the tower vpon the hill vntill that after the petards had wrought their effects: ſo as the Turkes being retired thither, they found very great reſiſtance, beſides the attemps of the enemies horſe which charged them behind; thrice they planted their ladders againſt the wall, and could not make them hold. Wherefore the Commiſſarie Lanzoni, hauing performed as much as a braue and reſolute man could doe in that extremitie, reſolued to leaue that place, and goe vnto ſome other where he might be more neceſſary: But being the laſt to make the retrait, he was ſhot through with two musket bullets, and ſuddenly ſlaine. The companie of the gallie of S. Iohn, vanquiſhed the two gallies in the port, wherof Inghirami the Admirall at ſea went to take poſſeſſion as ſoone as they had giuen him a ſigne, hauing the other two veſſels at libertie. A bloody combat within the Fort.

Within the fort, in the towers, and at the barracadoes, the combat was hot and dangerous; the Turks had deſpaire and the aduantage of the place on their ſides. The Chriſtians thruſt on by their valour and conſtant reſolution, preſt them on all ſides, there was nothing to bee ſeene but blood, wounded or dead men; but much more of the Turks ſide than of the Chriſtians. In the end, after a combat of foure houres, the Turkes fainted, ſome were taken, many were ſlaine, and the Chriſtians obtained an abſolute victorie: But as it could not be made without loſſe of their enemies, who made great reſiſtance: ſo there were 55 Chriſtians wounded, of which number De Vic a French Gentleman was one, who had a musket ſhot through his thigh going to charge a troupe of Turkes, which were retired into a tower: and ſome gentlemen were ſlaine, among the which was young Boiſſierre, a French man, whoſe valour in this action made them that ſaw him fight ſo generouſly, conceiue a certaine hope, that hee would haue prooued a valiant captaine, if heauen had lent him longer life. The ſorrow for his death was generall, as well among the Italian troupes, as among thoſe of his owne nation. Vernegue and Villandre, two other braue French gentlemen were alſo ſlaine. The dead and the wounded were carried vnto their gallies: They emptied the Fort of all the artillery, munition for warre, and victuals: the trophie of fortie Florentines heads was beaten down, and all the houſes ſet on fire. AGLIMAN being thus ruined, they ſhipped their bootie, with three hundred and fiftie Turkiſh ſlaues, hauing freed about two hundred and fortie Chriſtians which were in yrons. The two Turkiſh gallies were drawne out of the Port, and carried away, with eight other veſſels. In this triumph as the Admirall Inghirami bent his courſe towards LIGORNE; vpon the way a Turkiſh Caramouſall came into the midſt of the fleet, as into a toyle: It prepared to defend it ſelfe, the Patrons gallie inueſted it, but not without loſſe; for the Turkes made ſo great reſiſtance, as there were aboue foureſcore Chriſtians hurt or ſlaine; the Earle of Candale fighting alone at the prowe of the gallie, by the permiſſion of the Generall. But this Caramouſall being taken, and the Florentine marriners entred, it ſplit and ſunke ſuddenly. The great Dukes gallies incountred ſome other K L M

The twelfth of Auguſt following, Octauio of ARRAGON Generall of the gallies of SICILY, by the commaundement of the Duke of Oſſuna, Viceroy in that realme, parted from the hauen of PALERMO, with eight gallies well armed and manned, to ſaile into the Leuant. His firſt touch was vpon the Iſland of CERIGO, where he vnderſtood that the Admirall Baſſa of the ſea was gone from CONSTANTINOPLE with thirtie gallies, bending his courſe to the Iſland of NEGROPONT, whereas ſixtie others attended him in the hauen; and moreouer, that the gallies of RHODES prepared to goe and ioyne with him, all which Nauall fleet was to fall vpon SORIA, againſt the Turks rebels. The voiage of the gallies of Sicilie in the Leuant.

B Notwithſtanding theſe newes, Octauio continues his courſe vnto the Iſland of NICARIA, where hee vnderſtood by a Greeke veſſell, that the Turkiſh Admirall meant to ſend twelue gallies to RHODES, to guard certaine veſſels of the fleet, which came from ALEXANDRIA by the channell of SAMOS. True it is, that of twelue which were together when they parted, two were ſent by the Bey or captain which commanded them into the Iſland of CHIO, ſo as there remained but ten together. Octauio reſolued to charge theſe ten, cauſing his fleet to row that day, and almoſt a whole night as ſecretly as they could, along the ſhore of the firme land of NATOLIA, and at the breake of day he arriued at the cape of CORVO, twentie miles from CHIO, from whence he ſent his long boat to diſcouer. But in the meane time hee himſelfe eſpied the ten Turkiſh gallies not farre from him; at ſight whereof he ordered his gallies for They ſet vpon ten Turkiſh gallies.

C battell, with ſuch diligence, as at ſunne riſing hee was about the enemies gallies, and had inueſted them. At his firſt approach hee diſcharged all his ordnance, and then with his Admirall gallie he ioyned with the Turks gallie which carried the ſtanderd; the Spaniards entred, ſlew and maſſacred all that made reſiſtance: The combat began at the prowe, from whence they went to the poope, whereas the Bey or commander of the ten gallies ſtood, whom they forced to yeeld. In the meane time the other gallies of SICILIE charged the Turkes ſo furiouſly, as they tooke fiue, all great veſſels carrying lanthornes; two fled towards the land, hoping to ſaue themſelues, but the Turkes had ſcarce leaſure to leape to land, and to flie into the country, abandoning their veſſels to the Spaniards, who purſued them; the other three gallies hauing gotten ſome aduantage eſcaped by flight: ſo ſeauen onely came into the Spa-

D niards power, in the which they had a very rich bootie, freeing aboue a thouſand Chriſtian ſlaues, which were at the chaine, and by a ſtrange change of fortune, putting into their places the Turkes which had inchained them. Among the moſt remarkeable of the priſoners, were the commander of the ten gallies called Sinan, Bey of GRIGNA in the Iſland of CYPRVS; the Bey of ALEXANDRIA (ſonne to Piali Baſſa, who was defeated in the battell of LEPANTO, by Don Iohn of AVSTRIA) and ſome Raiſe or Captaines, and Patrons of gallies.

This Summer the Emperour Matthias being gone to an aſſembly of the Eſtates at PRESBVRG in HVNGARIE, in the meane time Sigiſmund Battori, who had beene prince of TRANSYLVANIA, and ſo great a terrour and ſcourge vnto the Turkes, as hee made Sinan Baſſa, ha- Sigiſmund Battori prince of Tranſyluania dies at Proge.

E uing an armie of 150000 men, to flie thrice within tenne dayes from before him, and would neuer indure the ſight of him, he hauing but 40000 men in his armie. But afterwards being the authour of his owne misfortunes and miſeries, by his inconſtant humours, he came and liued a priuate life at PRAGE, and there died of an Appoplexie. At the Eſtates of PRESBVRG they conſulted of the fortifying of their frontier townes, and manning them with good garriſons, knowing the infidelitie of the Turks, and doubting they would not obſerue the truce: but there was ſome queſtion in the aſſembly, touching the admiſſions of Germans into their garriſons; for that the Hungarians maintained they had a decree to the contrarie; and yet they could not defend themſelues without the aſſiſtance of Germanes: but in the end it was concluded, that the Germanes ſhould bee admitted equally with the Hungarians into their garriſons, but all other ſtrange ſouldiors ſhould be excluded. The Turks in the meane time The Turkes threaten warre in Hungarie.

F had burnt and ſpoiled many villages in HVNGARIE and TRANSYLVANIA, carried away many Chriſtians captiue, and committed many other actes of hoſtilitie, ſo as all men feared a new warre in HVNGARIE, but by the prouidence of God it was diuerted. For Sultan Achmat marching toward TRANSYLVANIA with a mightie armie, hearing vpon the way that Bethlem Gabor was acknowledged prince, vnder his protection, hee turned head toward CONSTANTI-

NOPLE,

NOPLE. But rather for the affaires of ASIA, whereas the rebels of NATOLIA had ſpoyled and burnt many places; and a certaine Arabian had reuolted againſt him, and vſurped the title of king, hauing drawne vnto his partie fiftie thouſand rebels, the which did ouerrunne and ſpoile the countrey which yeelded obedience vnto him, threatning his dominions with a greater ruine. Moreouer, the Portugals and Spaniards had made many incurſions vpon his places ioyning to the Red ſea, and had taken and ſpoiled ADEN, a place of importance: ſo as all theſe diſorders haſtened his returne into THRACE, to ſend forces againſt his Turkiſh rebels, and his Spaniſh enemies. But approching neere vnto the Imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, the plague was ſo violent, as he ſtaied at ADRIANOPLE vntill the end of this yeare, when as that horrible contagion ceaſed. He then came vnto the citie, whereas he made a very ſtately entrie; before him there marched his ordinary guard of fiue and twentie or thirtie thouſand Ianizaries, all the Baſſaes of the Court followed him in very great pompe, and before him there marched on horſeback two of his ſonnes, the pillars and hope of his affaires, the eldeſt being about ſeuen or eight yeares old. Paſſing before the Moſques, the Taliſmans or prieſtes of his law, made ſacrifices in his preſence for his proſperitie, they ſlew ſheepe and oxen vpon altars erected for that purpoſe, then they cut them in pieces, and gaue them vnto the people.

A great plague at Conſtantinople

The graund Seignior being returned to CONSTANTINOPLE after the great plague, notwithſtanding the Turkes hold a firme opinion of Predeſtination, and that they ſhall not die before their appointed time, and that the time of their death is written in their foreheads; yet apprehending the infection, by the aduice of ſome about him, hee commaunded all the dogges in the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, to be tranſported vnto SCVTARIB in ASIA (a towne aunciently called CHRISOPOLIS) and for the due execution thereof, euerie houſholder was to bring in his dogge firſt to the Cadi (which is the Iudge of the place) and to receiue from him a Tuſcarie or ticket for his paſſage, or elſe he was to pay foure chequines; by which meanes there were tranſported to the number of 50000 dogges. The reaſon of his ſending them away was, for that reading the actes of his father, hee found that thirtie yeares before, he had ſent away all the dogges for feare of the infection. The Sultan commaunded allowance of bread and fleſh to be carried euerie day to ſuſtaine them, which not ſufficing, the inhabitants were much oppreſſed, and readie to fall into mutinie; but by the aduice of his Muphti, they were at length tranſported from thence to an Iſland that was not inhabited, ſome ſixteene miles from CONSTANTINOPLE, where they all periſhed. Before their ſending away, the Graund Seigniour had propounded to his Muphti, to haue them all ſlaine: who made anſwere, That euerie dogge had a ſoule, and therefore it was not fit to kill them.

All the dogs ſent out of Conſtantinople.

The Turkes are wonderfull glad when they winne any one to their religion, and ſeeke by all meanes to ſeduce men either by force or by faire perſuaſion; whereof you may ſee an aſſured proofe, by a Iew who being turned Turke, ſoone after buying of grapes of another Turke, fell at variance with him about the weighing of his grapes; from wordes they fell to blowes, and the Iew-Turke beat the other, which hee indured verie patiently to incourage him as it ſeemed in his new religion. Soone after another Iew came to the Turke who had beene beaten, and demaunded of him why hee had ſuffered himſelfe to bee ſo abuſed? Who anſwered, You ſhall beat me as much if you will turne Muſulman, ſo zealous they are to winne Proſolites.

The care of the Turks to winne men to their religion.

This yeare in October, the Turkes obſeruing their feaſtes of Bairan (which is as our Eaſter) the which they obſerue twiſe a yeare, a Turke hauing drunke wine too freely (the drinking whereof is forbidden amongſt them, although they loue it well, and drinke in priuate) was apprehended, and carried before the grand Viſier, who ſeeing the fact verified, inflicted this puniſhment vpon him, to haue boiling lead powred into his mouth and eares, the which was ſpeedily executed.

A ſeuere puniſhment of a drunkard

Bethlem Gabor as you haue heard was ſeated quietly in the principalitie of TRANSYLVANIA, the Sultan ſupported him, and had ſent Sarder Baſſa with an armie againſt Gabriell Batteri who was then in poſſeſſion, but weake both of men, money, and friends, hee was not able to make head againſt them; ſo as being abandoned of his friends, and hated of his

A ſubiects for his tyrannie, he grew into deſpaire and was ſlain by his own ſoldiors. Wherupon the country yeelding obedience to Gabor, Sarder Baſſa retired out of TRANSYLVANIA with his Turks. Yet afterwards, ſome neerly alied to Battori (deſiring to reuenge his death) cauſed ſome alterations; and others ſeeking to get the prouince from the Emperour, had ſurpriſed HVST and other places in his name. The Sultan hearing this, wrote his letters to the noblemen and ſtates of the prouince. They were not ignorant he ſaid, that ſince the time that TRANSYLVANIA yeelded obedience to his predeceſſors, and him, they had alwaies liued in peace vnder his protection, and had often deſired and obtained ſuccour againſt their enemies: That, when as Botskay had bin annoied by the Germanes, aſſiſting him with great forces he had ſhakt off

B the yoke: That when as Battori his ſucceſſour had liued after his own will, they ſent Bethlem Gabor with complaints to his court by their generall conſent, and did eaſily obtaine forces to free the prouince from tyrannie. He being taken away, now a wiſhed day began to ſhine, the cloudes of tribulation being all diſperſed: That he had held Bethlem worthy to ſucceed Battori, and to enioy that prouince. Wherefore he had commanded all the noblemen to ſubmit themſelues vnto him, and to enioy a wiſhed peace: That Bethlem had ſent to aduertiſe him of the new practiſes of the Germans; wherefore he had giuen charge to the Baſſas of TEMESVVAR and AGRIA, and to the prince of VALACHIA to be watchfull to repell all theſe iniuries, admoniſhing the noblemen to yeeld ſpeedie obedience to Bethlem: to which end he had ſent them thoſe letters, that vpon the ſight thereof they might be admoniſhed of their duties; and

C if the Germans ſhould attempt any thing, they ſhould make reſiſtance vntil the comming of his forces: and following Bethlem in all things, they ſhould acknowledge him for their true and lawfull prince, and continue conſtant in their fidelitie, leaſt they ſhould prouoke his wrath againſt them, and draw vpon themſelues ſome great miſerie, writing much more to the like effect, concluding, That hee had fully purpoſed and reſolued, not to ſpoyle any one village or any fort in TRANSYLVANIA, nor to doe wrong to any man, nor ſuffer it to be done by any other, but would defend that prouince from all oppreſsion. Wherefore he would haue the Emperour aduertiſed, that if he meant to haue the peace inuiolably kept, he ſhould cauſe the ſaid places of TRANSYLVANIA to be preſently reſtored vnto the prince, or ſignifie his mind vnto him by letters.

D Of theſe rebels of ASIA, whereof we haue made mention, the Gouernour of SAREPTA or SIDON in SIRIA, called Armill or Emir Facardin, he who gaue entrance into his port to the Florentines, and receiued them in their courſes to the Leuant, hearing that the Baſſa of DAMAS, and the Baſſa of the ſea, with the gallies which he brought from CONSTANTINOPLE, and the threeſcore which he tooke at NEGROPONT (whereof we haue made mention) came to fall vpon him with a mightie and fearefull armie, he left his eldeſt ſonne within SIDON with forces to commaund there, and in other forts about it, and flying from a furious tempeſt of enemies, he went to ſea with three ſhippes, to retire himſelfe into EVROPE, with his foure wiues, tenne children, ſeuentie Turkes, and 14000 pound weight in gold. Hee arriued at LIGORNE, and went from thence to FLORENCE, vnder the protection of Coſmo de Medicis

Emir Facardin abandoned Sidon.

Emir retires to Florence.

The great Duke receiues him courteouſly.

E great duke of TVSCANIE, whoſe hands he kiſt, preſenting vnto him a Cuttelas verie curiouſly wrought, and inricht with ſtone, and two iewells to the great Dutcheſſe, to the value of ſixe thouſand crownes. This Turke though hee had no faith, yet hee found faith with this prince of TVSCANIE. Coſmo receiued him, defrayed him and all his traine, furniſhed him with money, whether it were by way of gratification, or that Emir had conſumed his owne: and by all kinde of courteſies made this Infidell ſee what difference there is to flye vnto the protection of a Chriſtian prince, or to haue recourſe vnto a Mahometan. They ſay that Emir made manie goodly ouertures for the ſetling of the Chriſtians in ASIA: but to attempt it with a good and happie ſucceſſe, it ſhould be neceſſarie that moſt of the Chriſtian princes would ioyne their wills and armes together for the generall good of Chriſtendome.

F It is true, that the great Duke Ferdinand deceaſed, and Coſmo his ſucceſſor had made proofe of their good intentions, by many generous enterpriſes againſt the Turke. But one prince alone cannot doe all.

Theſe things paſt in the yeare 1613, the end whereof concludes with the furie of terrible tempeſtes in the Mediterranean ſea. The tenth of Nouember a fearefull tempeſt full of lightning, thunder, and furious winds, was the cauſe of the loſſe of many gallies and ſhips in the port of GENOA, with a great nnmber of persons which were miserably drowned, which G losse was valued at abone 800000 crownes. The Port of NAPLES was not free from this storme, and the gallies of MALTA, with a great number of other vessels receiued great losse.

The grand Seignior hauing this yeare and the yeare before sustained great losse of his gal-lies and frigats in the Mediterranean sea, by the gallies of NAPLES, MALTA, and FLORENCE, and in the blacke sea by the Cossacks, who had taken two gallies well manned and richly laden; he now imposed a great taxe vpon all his Christian subiects towards the reparation of that losse, so as hee charged the Armenians to build him nine gallies at their owne costs, and the Grecians twentie: such is the tyrannie of the Turke, as he suffers not the poore Christians to enioy any thing, but he finds meanes to pull it from them. H

A conspiracie against the Visier Nassuf.

The grand Visier Nassuf held his credit with the prince, at whose returne from ADRIANO-PLE, many Ianizaries (to whom the Visier was very odious) conspired to kill him as he should enter in at the North gate comming from ADRIANOPLE, and had placed themselues there for the effecting of what they had intended: but comming neere vnto the gate, the Sultan (being ignorant of what was intended against the Visier) called for him to speake with him, keeping him by him vntill he was entred into the citie, by which means he escaped the pretended practise. Soone after Nassuf inuited the Sultan to a sumptuous feast, and within few daves after the Emperor feasted the Visier; who presuming vpon his great credit, caused all the crosses in the Church of S. Sophia (which is one of the goodliest monuments in CONSTANTINOPLE) to be thrown downe, and all the Images to be defaced, the which had stood intire euer since I the Christians gouernment.

The king of Persias crueltie against the Armenians.

The yeare before, the king of PERSIA had put to death 1200 Armenians vpon a false suggestion as if they had intended to reconcile themselues to the Pope: that king hating the Papists, & yet suffers diuers Iesuits to liue in his dominions. The English Embassadors chaplein desirous to know the reason of the Persians crueltie, conferred with the Patriarke of the Armenians which resided at CONSTANTINOPLE (for there are 2 Patriarks, wherof the one is vnder the Persian, & the other at CONSTANTINOPLE vnder the Turke) who told him that it was true he had miserably slaine many of their nation by the cunning practises of an Armenian, who had counterfetted letters from the Patriark of ARMENIA to the Pope, by which the Patriarke with his whole Church of Armenians, made offer to reconcile themselues to the Church of K ROME, and to acknowledge the Pope as their head, intreating the Pope to write to the king of PERSIA to giue them leaue to doe it freely; which letters the Pope receiuing, he rewarded the messenger bountifully, & returned letters by him to the king of PERSIA, wherby he intreated him to suffer the Armenians in his country to vse their consciences freely. The king of PERSIA hauing receiued these letters, grew into a great rage, causing many of them to be put to death saying, That if they would be obedient to the Pope, he could expect no seruice nor obedience from them:
notwithstanding the Papists said that this was done directly by the Patriarke, but the Armenians affirme that it was the practise of a counterfet rogue. Soone after there arriued 3 Em-bassadors at CONSTANTINOPLE, the one was a Circassian, the second a Georgian (and this was a Bishop) and the third a Mingrelian, all of them to complain of the Persians oppres- L sion & cruelty, imploring succors from the grand Seignior for their support. Presently after them arriued a Persian embassador, whom the Sultan would not admit to audience, vntill all controuersies were concluded betwixt himselfe & the Emperor, which was then in question, the Sultan hauing sent one Gasparo (sometime a seruant in the English embassadors house) to treat with the Emperor, by whose means at length all matters were reconciled betwixt them.

1614 The fall of Nassuf's fortune.

The yeare 1614 began by the horror of great prodigies, which were seen in diuers parts of HVNGARIE and SILESIA. Ouer the towne of VIENNA in AVSTRIA, the heauens grew so red and fearfully darkned, as they feared that either the last day was come, or else there would follow some horrible effusion of blood. But all these signes had no other effect this yeare, than the ruine of the great fortune, and prodigious authoritie of Nassuf Bassa, grand Visier of the Tur- M kish empire, formerly one of the greatest and most fearfull rebels which had carried armes in ASIA against the soueraigne power of their Sultan: but to comprehend more plainly the fall and declining of his fortune, let vs behold him in his beginning and first rising. Hee was the sonne of a Greeke Priest, borne in a little village neere vnto SOLONICA, and hauing been taken by the tribute, which the Turkes exact from Christians vpon their miserable children, ta-

A taking one of three; he was carried verie young to CONSTANTINOPLE, and there sold for three chequines or sultanins (euery one of which is not aboue eight shillings starling) to an Eunuch of the Sultans, who nourished him and bred him vp till he came to the age of twentie yeares, and afterwards sold him to a Steward of the Sultanaes house, to serue him in his charge: who finding this slaue to haue a spirit capable of greater affaires than the houshold, imployed him in the ouersight of the building of a rich and stately Mosque, which the Sultana caused to be erected at her charge: In this place he gaue such proofe of his wit and iudgement, to the Sultanaes content, that soone after shee gaue him the gouerment of her houshold. The beginning and progresse of Nassufs fortune

B The Sultan had a will to employ him in his seruice, and retired him from the Sultanaes house into his seraglio, where hee was honoured with the charge of the Capigi Bassa, or captaine of the Porters or Vshers of the seraglio; from thence hee was aduaunced to the dignitie of the Bassa of ALEPPO, and soone after hee was made Gouernour generall of MESOPOTAMIA. The commoditie of his gouernment (frontiring vpon PERSIA) stirred vp his ambitious thoughts, and his disordinate desire to become soueraigne of that countrey, and made him to entertaine many practises with the King of PERSIA, an ancient enemie to his master. The report of his practises came to CONSTANTINOPLE: the Sultan is aduertised, hee knowes the ambitious and stirring spirit of this Nassuf, and findes that he is verie profitable for his seruice, if he can by any mild course withdraw him from his C disloialties and intelligences with the Persian; wherefore hee dissembled the knowledge of his treacherous designes, and to gaine him the more powerfully, he gorged his ambitious appetite with the greatest dignitie of his empire. After the death of Murath Bassa, he honoured him with the place of graund Visier, and gaue him all his goods, and in his place made him Generall of the armie against the Persian, with promise to giue him his daughter in mariage. Thus was Nassuf aduanced by his dexteritie, wit, diligence, and trecherie, to the greatest charges of the greatest empire of the world. He is made gouernor of Mesopotamia. Nassuf made grand Visier and generall of the armie.

He entred into PERSIA, as Lieutenant generall of his masters armie, with the which hee made so great a spoile, as he forced Ka Abbas king of PERSIA now raigning, to demaund a peace; and after that he had granted him a surcease of armes, he brought his Embassador to D CONSTANTINOPLE, to conclude this peace to his masters benefit, as we haue formerly obserued. He enters in pompe, presents a million of gold vnto his Emperour, is well receiued at the seraglio, much made of by the Bassas, but more by the Sultan, who caused him to marrie his daughter. Fortune hauing thus aduaunced him to the height of greatnesse, not being possible to climbe higher, she ouerthrowes him, & doth precipitate him to the lowest degrees of misery. The Sultan feares his spirit, too headstrong by reason of his ambition; he growes iealous of his actions, and about the end of the yeare concludes his ruine and death. The commandement is giuen to Bostangi Bassa, that is to say, the Sultans chiefe gardiner, & ouerseer of his seraglio, and all his houses, one of the goodliest dignities of the court. Nassuf was at that time sicke in his house, Bostangi goes thither to visit him, & to cause him to be strangled, E being accompanied onely with 7 or 8 men; for that he would not giue any suspition of the commandment he had receiued from his master. Being come vnto his lodging, he demanded to speak with him, and Nassuf excused himselfe by his seruants, by reason of the discommoditie of his health, but the Bostangi (who would needs execute his commission) replied, that he could not return to the Sultan (who had sent him to haue certain newes of his health) before he had seen him, to be the better assured. At this reply Nassuf grew distrustful, & would without all doubt haue bin far from thence in some place of MESOPOTAMIA; but beleeuing whatsoeuer hapned to him was ineuitable, he commanded them to suffer the Bostangi to enter, who at his first approch entertained him with many complements of curtesie, and hauing demanded some questions of him touching his health, he drew out of his pocket a commandement F from the Sultan to Nassuf, to deliuer vnto him the seales of the empire, the which being presently done, he drew out another commandement vnto him, by the which he was enioyned to send him his head: then Nassuf cryed out aloud, and desired to speake with the Sultan, but the Bostangi answered, that he had no commission to conduct him to the seraglio, but to cause his life to be taken away presently: vpon this refusall, he intreats him to giue him leaue He forceth the Persian to a peace. The Sultan resolues to be rid of him, and concludes his ruine to waſh himſelfe in the next chamber, to the end that his ſoule (ſaid hee) ſhould not depart G or eight Capigies) being come to take away his life, and inuironing his bed, which was an vndoubted ſummons that hee muſt die; in the end he reſolues, and turning himſelfe vnto theſe executioners, he willed them to doe their dueties: whereupon they fell to worke, and caſting themſelues vpon him, they put a coad about his necke, and ſought to ſtrangle him;

but ſeeing that the fatneſſe of his repleat bodie would not ſuffer them to take away his life make himſelfe neceſſarie to his maſter, and liue more ſafely in combuſtions than in a calme; whereas the enuie and malice of his enemies gaue him a thouſand furious aſſaults. Thus Naſſuf Baſſa ended his dayes and fortune; before Gouernor of MESOPOTAMIA, Generall of an Imperiall armie, and grand Viſier of the Turkiſh Empire, aduanced to theſe ſupreme digni-ties by the great actions of his mind, but ouerthrowne ſhamefully to his ruine by his boun-

broken the bounds which reaſon preſcribeth to thoſe that fortune aduanceth by the fauour

Another diſcourſe of Naſſufs death. This death of Naſſuf is related after another maner by one who was then preſent in CON- K STANTINOPLE, the which I haue thought good to ſet downe as I haue receiued it from him.
The grand Seignior being much diſcontented with his Viſier; whether incenſed with ſuch as were neere about him, who both hated and feared Naſſuf, or doubting his great power, hee diſſembled his ſpleene, vntill hee might find ſome opportunitie for reuenge: yet it was not ſo ſecretly carried, but Naſſuf had diſcouered the Sultans diſcontent, and laboured by great guifts both to the Sultana and others to pacifie him, prouiding notwithſtanding in the meane time for his owne ſafetie, ſending horſemen daily ouer into ASIA, meaning to paſſe himſelfe when hee had gathered together a ſufficient ſtrength. But it fell out on the ſeuenth day of October, it being the Turkes ſabbath, that the Moone about eight a clocke at night was much eclipſed, which made the Turks expect ſome great accident. The grand Seignior L hauing formerly cauſed it to be bruited, that hee would about that time paſſe to viſite a new Moſque which was then in building; whereupon all the ſtreets were hanged with cloth and arras, and as the cuſtome was, a crie went before, that The king commeth; at the noiſe whereof Naſſuf (being then in his houſe) could not but diſcend to ſalute the Sultan as hee paſſed by:
But it was not the graund Seignior himſelfe, but his Boſtangi Baſſa, whom hee had cauſed to be attired like himſelfe, who being come before Naſſufs dore, and finding him ſtanding there, he ſuddenly leapt vnto him, and told him that the Sultans pleaſure was he ſhould deliuer vp his ſeale, whereat Naſſuf being amazed, demaunded what the Sultan meant to do; to whom the Boſtangi Baſſa replied, That he knew not what the princes pleaſure was, but if he would not deliuer it, he would return with that meſſage vnto him. Wherupon Naſſuf drew the ſeale M out of his boſome, and deliuered it. Then the Boſtangi Baſſa ſhewed him a warrant for his head, whereunto he preſently ſubmitted himſelfe, and then two Iamoglans ſtrangled him: his head was preſently cut off, and carried to the graund Seignior, and his bodie throwne into the ſtreet to be trampled on.

It was

A It was thought his death was procured by the wife of Cicala, Bassa of BABYLON, who had beene manzoled or deposed from his gouernment there by Nassuf, and was a little before returned to CONSTANTINOBLE, but could not bee allowed by Nassuf to haue any accesse vnto the grand Seigniors presence; whereupon he wrote a letter vnto the Sultan, wherin he accused Nassuf to haue conspired with the Persian to kill him, charging him with many things that were capitall. This letter he sent by his wife who was sister to the grand Seignior, who comming to his speech (although shee were watchfully obserued by Nassuf who was then present) left the letter in his chamber, and so departed. The grand Seignior finding this letter, and reading it, was much incensed against Nassuf, and neuer quiet in mind vntill he
B had his head. He writes that there were found in Nassufs house 80 bagges of gold, each bag containing 10000 chequinos. After Nassufs death Mechmet Bassa Admirall at sea (who had married Sultan Achmats eldest daughter) was made chiefe Visier; hee was borne in CONSTANTINOPLE, and the first naturall Turke that was euer Visier since CONSTANTINOPLE was wonne.

You haue heard in the last yeares relation, of some combustions which were growing in TRANSYLVANIA, and how the Sultan had written his letters of an imperious stile vnto the noblemen and states of the countrey, which letters were fixed vp in forme of a mandate throughout all TRANSYLVANIA, & in places that were neerest vnto those noblemen which held the Emperors partie against Bethlem. At the same time Bethlem defeated certaine troups
C of the garrisons at LIPPA and GENOA, which ouerranne and spoiled the countrey, so as the Gouernors of those places were forced to send to VIENNA, to demand succours of men and money. A Chiaus arriued at that time at LINTS, bringing letters vnto the Emperour from the graund Seigniour; the first point contained in them was, That his Imperiall Maiestie should haue a care, that the peace made betwixt them for twentie yeares should not bee violated, and that for his part he desired to obserue it faithfully. 2. That in the name of his Imperiall maiestie they had seized vpon certain places in TRANSYLVANIA, a prouince which had beene alwayes vnder his protection, which receiued her princes from his hand, and the which he was bound to defend against all her enemies. 3. That the tyrannie of prince Battori had constrained him to giue forces to Bethlem Gabor to dispossesse him of the principalitie of D TRANSYLVANIA: That after the death of the said Battori, he had inuested Bethlem to gouern it in peace. 4. That since, he had bin aduertised how that some troups of souldiors in the name of his Imperiall maiestie, contrary to the articles of peace, had by force seized vpon the forts of HVST and VIVAR, and the townes of NAGIPAN and TONASE. 5. That he had giuen expresse charge to Bethlem, not to suffer any enterprise, no not vpon the least village of his principalitie, to the end that nothing might be separated; but that he should repell the iniurie of the aggressor by force. 6. That he exhorted his imperiall maiestie, if he desired the continuance of the peace, to command his people to make restitution of the places vsurped, or to signifie his intention by the same Chiaus which hee had sent, to the end hee might bee fully assured: for the mischiefe increasing daily, the affection which he bare to the good of peace

Letters from the Sultan to the Emperor.

The Emperour receiued the Chiaus at LINTS verie honourably, and gaue him an answer to his letter wrapt in a piece of cloth of gold; the sence wherof was, That this businesse being of great importance, his Imperiall maiestie desired to confer with the princes Electors, and states of the empire to heare their aduice; after which he would acquaint him with his last resolution: And finally that he should rest assured, that for his part he would not attempt any thing contrarie to the peace. In the meane time there was a pettie warre in HVNGARIE, the incursions and spoyles betwixt the Christians and the Turkes beginning againe. The Turkes of the garrison of AGRIA going foorth, tooke a great number of cattell from the Christians; eight hundred Hayduckes aduertised of this spoile, pursued them so speedily, F as they met them before they came within halfe a league of their retrait, when they made them to leaue their prize, and put them to flight. The Bassa of AGRIA aduertised of the defeate of his out-riders, goeth foorth with one thousand men, to recouer the bootie from the Hayduckes, which they had newly taken from his souldiors: But after a sharpe encounter hee lost his horse, and two hundred of his men, being forced to make his retrait.

The Emperours answer to the Turke.

The Turkes courses in Hungarie.

From thence the Haiduckes went and spoiled the countrey about SOLNOC; some others hol- G ding the waies of STRIGONIVM or GRAN, tooke a Turkish Bride with her baggage, who was going from GRAN to BVDA; and foure hundred Boothalers (some of them Haiducks and the rest Turkes, men which hold no partie but their owne, to rob with the more impunitie) seized vpon BALASTER, MICOLVT, and FELAC: But at the recouerie of them, they were so ill intreated by the Hungarians, as most of them lost their liues there, and the rest were taken prisoners.

The Estates of Bohemia, Austria, Stiria, and others.

But the Emperour who desired to bee resolued in the important businesse of TRANSYL- VANIA, assembled the Estates of BOHEMIA, AVSTRIA, STIRIA, CARINTHIA, CAR- NIOLA, SILESIA, LVSATIA, MORAVIA, and HVNGARIE, his hereditarie countries, H whom he gaue to vnderstand, that the peace was violated in HVNGARIE, by the hostilities of the Turkes vpon the Christians; to whose preiudice Sultan Achmat had subiected vnto himselfe the prouinces of VALACHIA, MOLDAVIA, and TRANSYLVANIA: this last vnder the gouernment of Bethlem Gabor, who had made himselfe his vassaile. That the Sultan had sent word to his Imperiall maiestie, that hee should not pretend any thing there, to the end this countrey might bee wholly vnited to the Turkes Empire. Whereupon hee earnestly exhorted the assembly to consider wisely: First, whether TRANSYLVANIA should be left wholly in the Turkes power; Secondly, why the Sultan would not consent to the ratification of the truce; Thirdly, of the meanes to make war, if the necessitie of his affaires should force him; Fourthly, to what end the Turke would hinder his Imperiall Maiestie, that hee I should pretend no right to TRANSYLVANIA; Fiftly, that the Turke had sent him an Embassadour, who contrarie to the articles of peace, had not brought any presents; Sixtly, If they should make a new accord with the Turke, to consider aduisedly what assurance they might take, seeing that he would not consent vnto the sixt article of the peace.

The resolution of the Estates.

Their opinions were diuers vpon these propositions; but all ioyntly consented to maintaine the authoritie of the Imperiall Maiestie. The Hungarians onely interessed in their resolutions to warre, by reason of the spoyle of their country, as a passage for all their troups, they besought the Emperour, that if he meant to send any forces into TRANSYLVANIA, they might haue commaundement to march some other way, and not ouer their lands. Bethlem

The designes of Bethlem vpon diuers places.

Gabor in the meane time laboured to recouer those places which had been lost. Wherefore K he prouided himselfe to make some attempts vpon LIPPA, and other places, as at BORENE GENOE, and ARACH. The Gouernours of these places gaue aduice vnto Forgatsi Lieutenant generall to the Emperour in high HVNGARIE, representing vnto him the estate of their garrison, and the feare they had, that if Bethlem should once get them into his possession and power, hee would deliuer them ouer vnto the Turke: That if they would send them succours, they would rather endure all extremities, than yeeld them to the enemie. Yet for all this they make no haste to send them succours: and Sander Bassa according to the commandement he had receiued from the Sultan, hauing brought forces to Bethlem, the siege of LIPPA was resolued in the Estates of TRANSYLVANIA. On the fiue and twentieth of October the cannon being drawne out of VARRADIN to batter the fort; Bethlem went to inuest it, L made his approches, and battered it so furiously, as hauing made a reasonable breach, it serued first for a passage for foure hundred men to escape, who left the Gouernour with verie small meanes to defend the place, and without hope of succours from HVNGARIE, which made him come to a parley, promising to yeeld the place, to haue their liues and goods saued. The forts of GENOE and ARACH, were deliuered by the same capitulation. That these three places should not be put into the Turkes hands, but should remaine perpetually vnited to the principalitie of TRANSYLVANIA: and to take all interest from the Turkes, the Estates of the countrey should pay vnto Sander Bassa the charges and entertainement of his troups. These places thus gotten by Bethlem, hee manned them with new garrisons: the Imperialls which were within them being retired to Forgatsi the Emperours lieutenant in high HVN- M GARIE. But the Estates of TRANSYLVANIA being assembled at VARRADIN, disputed diuersly, whether they should resigne these three places into the Sultans power: some represented the discontentment he would haue if they were refused, and the inconuenience that might ensue: others were not of opinion that the prouince should be so dismembred, giuing

A the moſt important places thereof vnto infidels. Thus without conſenting or refuſing the deliuerie of theſe places to the Turke; the Eſtates concluded, that prince Bethlem ſhould doe therein what hee held moſt neceſſarie for the tranquilitie of the countrey: beſeeching him moſt humbly to free them from the Imperials, who had ſeized vpon Hvst and Vivar. Such were the affaires of Transylvania this yeare, a prouince diſtracted from the Emperours power by the Turkes practiſes.

At Constantinople, Sultan Achmat, deſirous to beautifie the outward part of his Seraigle with a goodly and ſpacious place vpon the ſea ſhore, he cauſed a platforme to bee made within the ſea, being eight hundred paces long, and one hundred and twentie broad. The Sultan cauſeth a platforme to be made at Conſtantinople.

B The Prouoſt of Constantinople cauſed this reſolution to be proclaimed, when as preſently euery houſe ſent forth a man, and the chiefe of families themſelues laboured there in perſon. There might you ſee the Baſſaes ſerue as ouerſeers of the workemen, and the Ianizaries and Spahies carying ſcuttles with a wonderfull alacritie; and at all houres of the day there was muſicke of diuers ſorts of inſtruments, to eaſe their labour, and to encourage them to continue. The Viſiers going to viſite the workemen, cauſed a largeſſe of pieces of ſiluer to bee caſt amongſt them. Thus the Sultan being ſerued with admirable diligence in this his worke of pleaſure, hee ſaw it finiſhed in three moneths, hauing beene begun in October this yeare.

Whileſt that the Sultan imployed his leaſure after this manner, in the ſtructure of a plat-
C forme within the ſea of Constantinople, certaine religious men parting from Pera, had a deſigne to build another in the waues of infidelitie; but more profitable for the health of ſoules. This was an imployment of Ieſuits into the countrey of Mingrelia, in old time called Cholcos: Lewis Grangier a Prieſt of this ſocietie, with two others of his Order, and an Armenian for their Interpreter, parted from Thrace with this godly reſolution, to preach vnto the people farre from God, the truth of his holy word, and to guide them happily in the way to heauen. He paſt the Boſphorus of Thrace, and the famous caſtles of Leander and Hero, and cut through thoſe waues, whereas he that could not quench the fire of his paſſion, quenched the flame of his life: he paſt beyond Pompeyes pillar, or rather that of the moſt happie Daniel Stylita, who erected his towards this mouth of the ſea: and about the D ſixt of Iune this ſame yeare they arriued at Verna, a famous towne in Thrace, whereas a companie of French ſouldiours (whom the violence of neceſſitie had ſome yeares ſince forced to leaue the Emperours ſeruice in Hvngarie) were in garriſon for the Turke, to defend his ſubiects againſt the incurſions of the Coſſaques: yet theſe French men doe ſtill obſerue the Catholique Religion inuiolably. From thence he ſailed towards Cordvla, and by the incounter of a little gallion he entred into the Port of Trebyzond. Within few dayes after he was carried in the ſame veſſell to Eriſſa in the countrey of Laxia or Lassia, which on the one ſide lookes towards the countrey of the Georgians, and on the other that of Trebizond. The Chriſtian religion hath been for a long time planted among thoſe people, but verie ill manured: for the fathers to free their miſerable children from the tribute where-
E with the Turkes oppreſſe them, cauſe their children to be circumciſed after the Mahometan manner, and for the ſame conſideration they marrie their daughters vnto Ianizaries. Moreouer they abandon themſelues to the Mahometan impietie, to the end they may be deliuered from their inſupportable oppreſſions, and their Turkiſh yoke. The Ieſuites found there a good ſubiect to worke vpon for the health of ſoules: during their abode there for certaine dayes they catechiſed the men, baptiſed the children, and aduertiſed the women maried vnto Turkes, what they were to doe for the maintenance of their faith: But for that their commiſſion or charge was to goe vnto Mingrelia or Cholcos, they went againe to ſea and ſailed towards Govea, which is the furtheſt corner of the blacke ſea: this hauen being verie vnfit to caſt anchor in, they followed the gallies which carried a Baſſa called Oneze from F Constantinople, who ſhould treat a peace on the behalfe of Sultan Achmat, with the prince of the Mingrelians, and diſpoſe him to pay a tribute; with theſe veſſels they went into a port called Macrogalo, nine miles from that of Govea, holding this place more ſafe than the other: But in truth there is little aſſurance whereas the waues and winds command ſoueraigntie. A Northweſt wind riſing about midnight on the fifteenth of September, draue their gallies neere vnto the ſhelfes and rockes, whereas one was broken and caſt away. Certaine Ieſuits go to Mingrelia or Cholcos. The ſhipwracke of certaine gallies.

away. This tempest continued many daies, and during the violence thereof, another gallie was lost, in the which the Iesuites had beene, by good aduice they had retired to land during the furie of the sea and winds. The Iesuites imputed the cause of this losse, to the prohibition which Oneze the Bassa had made vnto them, not to passe into MINGRELIA before the peace were concluded with the princes of that countrie; the which grew long, by reason of the difficulties which happened in the treatie. In the end those princes resoluing to pay the tribute vnto the Turke, it was concluded. G

A peace betwixt the Turks and the Georgians.

The libertie of trauell followes peace, Grangier and his companions proceeded in their iourney; twentie daies after their departure from MACROGALO, they arriued at SATRAPELLA, a place of GEORGIA, whereas the princes Visier came to visit them, and after the Georgian manner saluted them, bare headed, and kneeling vpon one knee. Gorell prince of the Georgians, (who was then at BARLET, whereas the court was to passe the feasts of Christenmas) being aduertised of the arriuall of these new Christian and French preachers, sent for them, receiued them fauourably, and saluted them bare headed and kneeling. After that he had made them to blesse his court, he held many discourses with them of the trueth of the Romane church; and of the Popes power, as the father of all Christendome; being mooued partly thereunto by a feeling of pietie to the church, and partly from the instructions he receiued from these Iesuites, so as enlightened with a new beame of the true light; he intreated Grangier to craue absolution of his sinnes from the Pope, the which (said hee) he may giue me by the power he hath from God; promising to send him his confession in writing. But vnderstanding that the Iesuite had power from the Pope to absolue him; he purged his conscience of all his sinnes, by a generall confession of his life. Without doubt the zeale of these soules, so farre from succour, shewes plainely what the haruest would be, if so many labourers were sent as are necessarie. A Monke of GEORGIA, who had liued at Rome for the space of twelue yeares, had in former times planted pietie there: the which they of this mission did now alter. This prince Gorell intreated the Iesuites, to send him some of their companie at their returne into EVROPE, promising to make great esteeme of them, and to giue them a church, a house, and all things necessarie for their maintenance. The prince offered them siluer, which they refused modestly, excusing themselues vpon the rules of their institution, which forbids them to receiue any temporall recompence for the administration of holie things: Thus they parted from this prince, who commended much their manner of liuing, and caused them to be conducted to SATRAPELLA, to continue on their iourney into MINGRELIA. The third of Februarie in the yeare 1615, they parted from this towne with the Turkes, who came to conclude the peace, and passing by the bankes of Fasso (a riuer which doth water the countrie of COLCHOS, now called MINGRELIA) they arriued at HERAILCANO, otherwise called HERACLIA, and from thence to MARGOVLA, whereas the prince of the Mingreliens (called Dodran) then remained, being busie in the reception of Threbis Cham king of GEORGIA, who was come thither to visit him, being expeld his countrie by the king of PERSIA. The Iesuites were brought to kisse the hands of prince Dodran, and of Lipartia his vncle, who was regent of the realme during his minoritie. They both promised them assistance in their affaires, sending them to the towne of MACAVRY, to make their abode there whilest they were busied in the affaires of the countrie, the which at that time were somewhat confused. The Bishop of that place entertained them with great demonstration of loue, and soone after, making a feast to Threbis Cham, or prince of the Georgians, he would needs haue the Iesuites assist at this banquet, for a great testimonie of his loue. It is the manner of those of COLCHOS or the Mingreliens, as well as the Georgians, to sing at their meat, the Threbis Cham desired that the Iesuites might sing some note when it came to their turne, whereof they excused themselues diuers times: But there was no remedie they must do as others haue done, whereupon they sung the hymne of Plange Lingua &c. appointed for Holie Thursday. Being thus fauourably entertained in MINGRELIA; they make their residence at MOCAVRY, with hope to labour profitably for the health of soules, which erre in that countrie through the darkenesse of ignorance, for want of men to teach them the way of trueth. They are Christians of the Greeke profession, vnder the commaundment of diuers princes, alwaies in war either against the Turke or the Persian: They carrie the name

A of Cham, which is as much to say, as king or soueraigne prince: The Sophie had dispossest Threbis Cham chiefe king of GEORGIA of all his countries, in the yeare 1613, who had retired himselfe into MINGRELIA as you haue heard.

Whilest those men labour to sow the seeds of true doctrine of the Apostles in the soil of Mahometisme, a Turke passing out of ASIA, comes into Christendome to seeke the light of the trueth, and demands fauourable assistance and succors from Christian Princes, to enter into the possession of the Empire, whereunto his birth and the degrees of a lawfull succession seemed to call him by a iust title. The discourse of his birth, of his fortunes, and of his pretensions to the Turkish Empire, is comprehended in this following relation. He tearmed
B himselfe the sonne of Mahomet the third, father to Achmat, now sitting in the imperiall throne at CONSTANTINOPLE; he maintained that his father by foure wiues or concubines had had foure sonnes, that is to say, Mustapha, who was strangled, for that he would haue dispossest his father of his kingdome; Iacaia (which was himselfe) Achmat now raigning, and Osman: yet it seemes by the sequell of the historie that he had another Mustapha: That hauing been sent for to come out of MAGNESIA to CONSTANTINOPLE, his mother (who had beene a Christian, and baptized vnder the name of Hellen; but was afterward ingaged in the companie of Mahomet the third, for the worth of her beautie, and knowne in the Turkie by the name of the Sultana Lalpare) could not conduct him to his father, for that he was dangerously sicke of the small pockes. And this princesse desired much, to find some fauourable occa-
C sion, whereby she might be freed from the damnable errors of Mahomets law, and returne to the wholesome way of the Christian faith, and retire her sonne Iacaia farre from the power of those bloodie lawes, which sprinckle the Imperial Scepter of him that comes vnto the crowne with the blood of his brethren; she well foresaw that Iacaia being but the second of Mahomets sonnes, should one day by his death secure the life of Mustapha his elder, and that the onely meanes to preserue him was to retire him into Christendome. Wherefore she laboured seriously in this designe, and made vse of a fauourable fiction, giuing it out, that her sonne Iacaia was dead of the small pockes; and hauing supposed in his place the sonne of an Eunuch dead of the same disease assisted at his funerall, and by her constrained teares subtilly disguised her designe. An Eunuch called Astam Mehemet was the faithfull secreta-
D rie of her enterprise; with him she leaues MAGNESIA, a prouince in ASIA, and vnder pretext to go vnto certain bathes there by, she gets her down to the sea side, passes into EVROPE, and transports her sonne into MOREA, sometimes called HELLESPONT, and lodgeth him (as vnknowne) in the Bishops pallace in the towne of MICLO. Iacaia was aboue nine yeares old; she held him not secure at MICLO, but transported him into MACEDONIA, vnder the habite of a Greeke Monke; and retires him into the towne of CASSANDRIA; where she discouers vnto the Archbishop of THESSALONICA, a man learned and of a holie life, the qualitie of her sonne, and the desire she had to make him a Christian: intreating him in charitie to take them both into his protection. This Archbishop lodgeth the mother in the monasterie of religious women of our Ladie of THESSALONICA, and giues the cu-E stodie of the sonne vnto an Abbot of S. Michaell, a man learned in all the sciences, vnder whom he profited wonderfully, aswell in the Greeke tongue as in many goodly arts. I doe well know this to be true, for that I haue conuersed with him for the space of sixe moneths, and haue seene him often in the companie of learned men speake the Greeke, with as great facilitie as his Turkish and mother tongue. He continued in this Monasterie, vnder the care and gouernment of this learned Abbot, vntill the age of seuenteene yeares, that is to say, for the space of eight whole yeares; during which time, his mothers teares, the holie instructions of the Abbot, (but rather the diuine fauour) made him to enter into the way of his soules health, and become a Christian. The Archbishop of THESSALONICA clensed his soule from the pollutions of the law of Mahomet, and baptised him in the church of S. Anastasius, F without the citie of THESSALONICA; yet secretly, for feare least the Eunuch comming to discouer this misterie, should abandon him and publish abroad the place and estate of his solitarie aboad, and so be miserably taken. Thus Iacaia calling himselfe Sultan, being alreadie in some assurance of the crowne of Heauen by the promises of holie baptisme, whilest that he was in the beginning of his pretensions to that of the Turkish empire, he leaues the monasterie where he had beene instructed; and in the companie of the Eunuch trauels vp and downe GREECE, passing away (in the length and varietie of his voyage) the impatiencie of his age and desires; and for that he would not be knowne, he takes vpon him the habite and the licence of a Deruis or religious Turke. But when he came to the citie of SIOPIA, he vnderstood the newes of the death of the Emperour Mahomet the third his father, and the reioycing for the new aduancement of Sultan Achmat to the Empire; learning at the same instant, that Mustapha his elder brother had beene strangled by the commandment of his father. The displeasure which he conceiued for that he had not been bred vp at CONSTANTINOPLE with the rest, to receiue so rich a crowne as that of the Turkish Empire, made him to wauer in diuers irresolutions; sometimes he would go into PERSIA to the Sophie, to haue succours from him, and with him to make warre against his brother: sometimes he would serue for a support and countenance to the rebels of ASIA, and iustifie their partie. After many discourses with the Eunuch touching his affaires, he sends him vnto the sonne of Peri Bassa, a rebell against the Emperour Achmat; the Eunuch treats for his maister, and receiues for him the rebells oath; and returning to TARLIS, where the Sultan Iacaia remained; he conducted him to Peri Bassa, to bee the head of his troupes. Iacaia arriues and sees himselfe obeyed by an armie readie to fight: for the Deftarden or treasurer being sent against the rebell Peri by the Grand Seignior with seuen thousand horse and three thousand foot, was alreadie vpon the bankes of the riuer Bardate readie to giue him battell. The Bassaes troupes (being lesse in number of fighting men) went to assaile him. There was a sharpe incounter; but in the end the Deftarden was victor, and the troupes of Peri Bassa defeated, and Iacaia being wounded in foure places of his bodie, was forced to saue himselfe on the other side of the riuer, where wandring vp and downe the fields, he found reliefe with a poore peasant, and soone after with an Abbot there by, who entertained him, and caused him to bee cured, holding him to be one of the Deftardens pages, as he himselfe said.

He ioines with the rebels of Asia.

The rebels defeated, and Iacaia wounded.

He sends to Constantinople and corrupted the Visier.

His wounds being cured, Iacaia returnes againe towards GREECE, where he finds his mother, confers with her, and soone after with the Eunuch, of the estate of his affaires; and concludes with both of them, to send to CONSTANTINOPLE, to the Visier Deruis (who at that time was discontented with the Emperour Achmat) to sound his disposition, and to see if he might gaine him to his partie: The Eunuch vndertakes the voyage, he speakes with the Deruis, and finds him disposed to entertaine the offers of Iacaia: The conspiracie was concluded, and they sweare to kill Achmat, and to settle Iacaia in the Imperiall throne. Hereupon he transports himselfe to CONSTANTINOPLE in a disguised habite: But when as they were readie to execute their enterprise (say they) the Deruis died; be it that the Emperour Achmat had discouered their designe, or otherwise. Thus Iacaia being frustrate of his hope to effect any thing by this meanes, he left the citie and fled towards the blacke sea, and then wandred into the countries of VALACHIA and MOLDAVIA, following the Carock of a POLAND embassadour on foot, vntill he came vnto the citie of CRACOVIA, whereas fortune had laid a snare for him, which brought him in danger of his life; For a Chiaus being come from CONSTANTINOPLE, and knowing him, he desired the king of POLAND in his masters name, to stay him, assuring him that by this meanes, he should strictly bind vnto him the affections of Sultan Achmat: the king refused his vniust demand, holding himselfe much honoured to see his Court the refuge of vnfortunate princes. After this refusall the Chiaus flies to trecherie; he corrupts certaine Tartarians of the kings guard with money, who promised to murder Iacaia; and doubtlesse they had performed it, if a Flemish imbroitherer had not aduertized him, and lent him his lodging for certain daies to hide himselfe; after which he freed himselfe from danger and past to PRAGVE towards the Emperour Rodulphus who was then liuing.

Iacaia in danger of his life at Cracouia.

He retires to Prague to the Emperour.

In this Imperiall Court he found reliefe, and meanes to ease his forepast miseries: The Emperour furnished him with all things necessarie: he spent a whole yeare there, and was acknowledged during his aboad, by many Turkes which came to PRAGVE, for brother to their Emperour Achmat. There wanted nothing but succours to effect his designes: But he findes nothing but faire words and good wishes at PRAGVE; so as he was forced to seeke the effects elsewhere. Certaine Saxons that were his friendes, aduised him to passe to FLORENCE to Ferdinand the great duke of TVSCANIE: he takes directions from that princes embassador

He comes to Florence to the great duke of Tuscanie.

A Embaſſador reſiding at PRAGE, and goes on his iourney: But entring into ITALIE hee heares that Ferdinand was dead; theſe mournfull newes made him to reſolue to ſeeke ſome other place, if Coſmo ſucceſſor to Ferdinand, and the great dutcheſſe his mother had not called him backe. He came then to FLORENCE, where he was honourably entertained, and lodged for the ſafetie of his perſon in the fort of S. Iohn, where he was ſupplied with all ſorts of commodities. The great duke Coſmo gaue him the title of Excellencie, appointed him horſes and caroches, and ſuch companie as he delighted in, for the pleaſure of hunting. He had not ſtaied long at FLORENCE, but he ſaw himſelfe aſſiſted with ſuch forces as he deſired. The great duke Coſmo cauſed his Gallions to be armed, ſending them into the Leuant,
B vnder the commaund of the knight Beauregard, where he had conference with Naſſuf Baſſa, at that time cheife of the rebels of ASIA. He offers him men, armes, and money if he would come to land and march towards PERSIA, whither many rebels were retired. But hee who commaunded the Florentine Gallions, had no commiſſion to leaue him in the hands of Naſſuf; wherefore he carried him backe to FLORENCE to his highneſſe.

He maketh a voyage into the Leuant in the dukes Gallions.

During the time that Iacaia was aboord the Gallions, the great Duke ſent diuers perſons into many parts of the Leuant, to informe themſelues carefully of theſe things which he had deliuered, not onely touching his owne perſon, but alſo of his mother, and they all brought backe certaine prooſes of the truth of his diſcourſes. This gaue the great duke ſubiect to impart this faire occaſion vnto SPAINE, to labour for the common good of Chriſtendome:
C He wrote vnto the Catholique king, and informed him of the qualitie of Iacaia, to the end that contributing ſuccours to his perſonage, they might vndertake ſome happie enterpriſe againſt the Turke. The king of SPAINE was content he ſhould be ſent to NAPLES: commaunding the Viceroy to giue him a reception fit for his qualitie. Iacaia went on his iourney, being accompanied by ſome, by the great dukes commaundement: But according to the newes which he receiued from NAPLES, he ſtaied at AVERSO, where he was receiued by the Gouernour with much honour. The Viceroy came to viſite him, gaue him the right hand, and the title of Excellencie. But as the counſell of SPAINE was tedious in their reſolutions, and delayed too long (as Iacaia ſuppoſed) the ſuccours which he expected; he parted from AVERSO to go to MILLAN, and from thence in a diſguiſed habite paſt again
D into the Leuant, to ſound their willes that might aduance his pretenſions and bring them to a happie end, but he preuailed as little as he had done before. Beſides all theſe voyages which we haue deſcribed, to the end he might leaue no means vnattempted to aduance his affaires, he went to ROME to kiſſe his holineſſe feet. Cardinall Belarmine receiued him, gaue him the right hand, and the title of Excellencie: the Pope aſſured him of his affection and ſuccours; but it was neceſſarie the ſecular powers ſhould begin to leuie men, and make the firſt ouerture to warre.

Iacaia goes to Naples and Millan.

He comes to Rome.

Since, we haue ſeene him in FRANCE, and at PARIS, vnder the protection of the duke of NEVERS, entertained by the bountie of this prince, and aſſiſted by his councell: And doubtleſſe if the troubleſome combuſtions of a ciuill war had not directed the armies of this
E duke, we had ſeene ſome happie ſucceſſe of the affaires which he treated in LORAINE, GERMANIE, and other places, to the ruine of the Turkes, and the good of Chriſtendome. Finally, as for this Turke called Iacaia, tearming himſelfe eldeſt brother to the Emperour Achmat now raigning at CONSTANTNOPLE, and for ſuch acknowledged by many: Yet ſome affirme (yea ſuch as haue conuerſed in the Eaſt) that Sultan Mahomet had but three ſonnes, which were Muſtapha, Achmat, & Oſman: Notwithſtanding it is heard to diſcouer in this perſonage any ſignes of an Impoſture; I haue often frequented with him, and carefully obſerued his carriage and actions: And haue alwaies noted in him a carriage and mind borne to great matters. This is all that we could learne of this man.

Stephano or Tomſho of whom we haue made mention in the yere 1612, hauing ouerthrown
F Conſtantine the lawfull prince, and made himſelfe Vayuod of MOLDAVIA by the ſupport and tyrannie of the Turke: as he held it by vſurpation, without any iuſt title, ſo he gouerned with all crueltie and inhumanitie, preferring crueltie before clemencie, and imitating that tyrant, who ſaid openly; That he reſpected not the loue of his ſubiects ſo as they feared him. Euen ſo this Stephano at his firſt entrance plotted how hee might root out all the noblemen in the countrie, whom in their language they call Boyers, with all others of credit and authoritie in

in the countrie, both for that they ſupported Conſtantine, as for the iealouzie he had of them, being beſt able to reſiſt his tyrannous deſſignes: being alſo the common diſpoſition of ſuch as vſurpe any eſtate by wicked practiſes, to be alwaies in feare to be diſpoſſeſſed, and to bee entreated according to their merits. He began firſt with the Lord of BOTACAN brother to the princeſſe widdow to Ierimie, whom he cauſed with two others of the chiefe noblemen to be miſerably and inhumanely impaled, as if they had beene two notable theeues and murderers; and not content herewith, ſoone after he cauſed three ſcore and fifteen Boyers to be apprehended, cutting off all their heads, and would not pardon any one, notwithſtanding the great inſtance that was made by their kinsfolkes, charging them with the crime of treaſon, as if they had conſpired againſt his perſon, hauing no proofe at all: But theſe his cruelties did nothing daunt the Boyers, as Stephano had perſuaded himſelfe; but contrariwiſe they were the more incenſed, and many of them tooke armes openly, and had then ſeazed vpon him, beene reuenged of his cruelties, and ſet their countrie at libertie (which had not beene ruined as it was afterwards) if he had not beene aſſiſted by the citizens of YAS, whom he coniured to ſecond him in this occaſion, promiſing them immunities of all ſubſidies: In regard of which promiſe, theſe poore wretches preferring their priuate profit before their publique ſafetie; imployed themſelues in the ſeruice of this tyrant, and fought valiantly againſt the Boyers, who were come to aſſault him in the citie of YAS; But finding that hee was better aſſiſted than they expected (after ſome light skirmiſh) they retired aſwell as they could; whereof many were taken priſoners, whom the tyrant cauſed to be ſlaine in cold blood, or impaled, to terrifie the reſt.

The noblemen reuoult againſt Stephano.

The Boyers which eſcaped from this defeat, knowing that there was no hope of mercie in Stephano, who was full of reuenge, nor by conſequence any ſafetie in MOLDAVIA during his gouernment, they reſolued to haue recourſe vnto the princeſſe (widow to Ieremie) who had fled into POLONIA when as ſhe receiued newes of the taking of her ſonne Conſtantine. This princeſſe vnderſtanding from the Boyers of the tyrannous gouernment of Stephano, and that moſt of the Moldauians were reſolued to ſhake off the yoke of his tyrannie, and deſired to haue prince Alexander in his place, remembring the good vſage they had receiued from the deceaſed prince Ieremie his father: Theſe conſiderations, together with a deſire of commaund vnder her ſonne (who was then but ſixteene yeares old) were ſtrong motiues to perſuade both her and her ſonne to imbrace this occaſion, the which they imparted to prince Viſinowiskie ſonne in law to the princeſſe, and to prince Correskie, who at that time aſpired to marrie her youngeſt daughter: Theſe princes not onely allowed of this deſigne, but they offered themſelues willingly to accompanie prince Alexander into MOLDAVIA, and to take the whole care of his armie. This reſolution being taken they preſently emploied all their credit to leuie men, and had within leſſe than two moneths drawne together tenne or twelue thouſand foot and horſe, Polonians, Coſſackes, and Tranſyluanians: whereof the Vayuod Stephano being aduertized, he preſently leuied what forces he could, of Moldauians, Tartarians, and Valachians, hauing drawne together an armie of almoſt 20000 men, which he kept about YAS, and there reſolued to attend the princes of POLONIA.

Prince Alexander called into Moldauia by the Boyers.

Prince Alexander being aduanced with his armie within two leagues of CAMINITHE in PODOLIA, he was much troubled to paſſe the riuer of Nieſtre, which diuides that countrie from MOLDAVIA, fearing the fort of COCHINA, in the which there was a ſtrong garriſon of Moldauians, and ſtore of munition to defend the paſſage of the ſaid riuer: But it fell out happily for prince Alexander; for the captaine which commaunded in the ſaid fort, being much diſcontented at the cruelties of the Vayuod Stephano, came voluntarily of himſelfe to offer his ſeruice to Alexander, and brought him the keyes of the fort, leauing all to his diſpoſition; ſo as he paſt his armie eaſily into MOLDAVIA, and in ſigne of ioy diſcharged many vollies of his great ordnance, which made Stephano diſtruſt the affections of the Moldauians, and to feele a pricking in his conſcience which doth neuer abandon tyrants and vſurpers.

The fort of Cochina yelded vnto prince Alexander.

Prince Alexander making ſome ſtay with his armie at COCHINA in the yeare 1615, aduanced towards Yas, and being come within halfe a daies iourney, he ſent forth eight hundred Coſſackes (choſen out of a great number) to diſcouer the countenance of his enemies armie: but they were not farre aduanced before they encountred 1500 Tartarians, ſent by 1500 Tartarians defeated by the Coſſackes.

Stephano

A Stephano to giue ſome charge to the Polonians. Although the Coſſackes were fewer in number, yet finding the Tartarians in diſorder, they charged them ſo reſolutely as they defeated a great part, and put the reſt to rout. After which exploit they brought word to prince Alexander that Stephanos armie might be about the number of fifteen thouſand men, but they were ſuch as were gathered vp in the countrie, and not trained vp to armes, who were rather drawne to it by conſtraint than of their free will, and therefore were not much to be feared. This happie ſucceſſe, together with the report made by the Coſſackes, did greatly encourage Alexanders armie, being alſo much incenſed againſt Stephano for certaine letters which hee had written to their prince, full of threats, as if both hee and they had beene alreadie at his
B mercie, the which did the more incourage the Polonians, and made them reſolue rather to die fighting, than to fall into the hands of this cruell tyrant. The ſame day there came certaine deputies of the Moldauians to prince Alexander, without the priuitie of Stephano, to know what his deſſigne was, and to intreat him to take pittie of MOLDAVIA, which was threatened with a ſpeedie ruine, if the warre continued any longer; to whom the prince made anſwere, that his intent was not to oppreſſe MOLDAVIA, but to free it from the tyrannie of Stephano; that he had beene inuited by a great number of the Boyers, who had come vnto him into POLONIA to that end, and had giuen him aſſurance, that it was the common deſire of the Moldauians, That vpon this confidence he had marcht with what forces he could draw together, and that if he did preuaile in his deſſignes (as he aſſured himſelfe with their aſſiſtance) he would gouerne them with no leſſe mildnes than his father prince
C Ieremie had done, whoſe ſonne and lawfull ſucceſſor he was. The deputies returned well ſatisfied with this anſwere, and hauing publiſhed it in diuers places, many Moldauians came and ioined with the prince his armie, and aſſiſted him faithfully in this action.

Deputies ſent from the Moldauians to prince Alexander.

In October prince Alexander aduancing about three leagues with his armie, hee made a ſtand in a faire champian where there were good ſprings to refreſh them, and in the meane time he called a councell at war, to reſolue what courſe he ſhould take, and when he ſhould draw the enemie to fight. In the meane time he had ſent a troupe of Coſſackes to diſcouer the armie, who brought word that they were ranged in battell, and that they had twentie cannons readie in front, the which did not much amaze prince Alexander, for that ſome daies
D before, the Generall of Stephanos artilerie had ſent to aſſure him, that if he gaue battell, hee would annoy his men as little as hee could, hauing a deſire to ſerue the prince, and by this meanes be reuenged of Stephano, who had cauſed his brother in lawes head to be cut off, vpon a falſe ſuſpect which he had conceiued againſt him being innocent. The which ſhould teach princes, that nothing doth procure them more ſecret enemies than crueltie, and that at one time or other they in whom they moſt relie abandon them whenas they leaſt expect it. The Vayuod Stephano meaning to make a ſecond diſcouery of the princes armie, ſent 1200 Tartarians, and two or three hundred Moldauians, who being ſeene a far off (for that it was in a plaine champaine) the prince ſent 500 Coſſackes with 400 Polonian lances to incoun-
E ter them: The Tartarians perceiuing it, made a ſhew at the firſt as if they would retire, to draw them by little and little from their campe; and being about a league off, they made a ſtand, thinking that they durſt not charge them: But they were ſoone deceiued, for the Polonians fell vpon the Tartarians with ſuch furie, as they ouerthrew them, and ſlew moſt of them, ſo as there eſcaped not aboue fiue or ſix hundred, who retiring to their campe cauſed a great amaſement. The princes armie was much encouraged by this exploit, and increaſed dayly in number, as it is vſual in ciuil war to follow that partie which hath the firſt aduanced.

The Generall of Stephanos artilleriey e ſolues to betray him.

A ſecond deſeat of Stephanos Tartarians.

Preſently after this execution, the prince meaning to aduance his armie towards the enemies campe, his foreward was ſtayed by a battalion of one thouſand horſe, who had the night before ſeaſed vpon a narrow paſſage betwixt a poole and a marriſh, by the which they knew the Polonian armie muſt paſſe: But this obſtacle was ſoone taken away, by the F aduice which was giuen by certaine Moldauians, to ſend a companie of horſemen by a way vnknowne to the enemie, by which meanes they might ſurpriſe them behind, before they ſhould be diſcouered. The execution of this ſtratagem was giuen to the Coſſacks, who ſpeedily went, being guided by certain Moldauians; who comming within 50 paces of the enemie vndiſcouered, they charged them, & were ſeconded ſo fitly by the forward, that ſtaid on the other ſide; as of one thouſand horſe there returned not aboue fiftie to their campe, to carrie newes of their bad ſucceſſe. G

Prince Alexander hauing happily opened this paſſage, he aduanced with his armie within cannon ſhot of Stephanos campe. Prince Viſnouiskie was of opinion that they ſhould make a kind of incloſure with their carts, which might ſerue them as a fort, hauing no place of retreat within tenne leagues; the which being diſcouered by Stephano, he ſhot certaine vollies of cannon through their fort, ſo as there were ſome ſouldiours ſlaine and ſome hurt: And the prince anſwered him with the like, but to ſmall effect, for that night ſurpriſed them, neither had they aboue eight ſmall pieces. Prince Viſnouiskie ſpent the night to encourage his ſouldiours, letting them vnderſtand that they had no reaſon to be amazed, although their enemies were more in number, for that moſt of them were peaſants, neuer trained vp in armes nor ſeene battell; whereof they had had good proofe in many encounters, where they had euer beene victors ouer their enemies, although they were inferiour in number: That they were ſo many teſtimonies and aſſurances that God did fight for them, and would vſe them to puniſh the tyrannies of Stephano, and his cruelties againſt MOLDAVIA. Finally if they were victors (whereof he doubted not, if they did their duties) there was not any one but ſhould returne loaden with rich ſpoiles and recompences from prince Alexander. This did ſo encourage the ſouldiours, as they proteſted all with one voice, rather to die than to faile of their duties. Moreouer the princes gaue the Colonels and Captaines to vnderſtand of the intelligence they had with the Generall of Stephanos artillerie, wherewith they were much comforted. H I

The diſpoſition of the two armies.

The next day being the eleuenth of October, they began to put their armies in battaile, during the which there were diuers skirmiſhes, wherein Alexanders partie had ſtill the aduantage; ſo as it ſeemed they were ſo many preſages of good fortune which ſhould befall them that day. The princes armie was ordered by Viſnouiskie, to whom prince Alexander had giuen the charge of Generall, as moſt capable, hauing ſundrie times giuen ſufficient proofes of his ſufficiencie and valour in other battells. This Generall ſeeing Stephanos horſemen diuided into three ſquadrons, and the Tartarians moſt aduanced, he appointed the Coſſackes to incounter with them, the which was iuditiouſly and diſcreetly done, for they both go freely to the charge, neither are they couered with any armes, but onely with the skinnes of certaine beaſtes, wherewith they make themſelues to ſeeme as fearefull as they can, obſeruing no order in their fighting, and vſing cries which are fearefull to ſuch as are not accuſtomed vnto them; and being once broken they ſeldome returne againe to the charge. The Polonian Lanciers called in their language Houſſarskie, being about one thouſand and fiue hundred men well armed, made the ſecond battallion of Alexanders armie, led by prince Coreskie, and were placed on the right hand againſt 3000 Tartarian, Valachian, and Moldauian horſemen. The Hungarian foot being about 3000 men were in the middeſt of prince Alexanders armie with the cannon, vpon a little hill of ſome aduantage; and on the left hand was the reſt of the Chaualrie, who were led by the princes Alexander and Viſnouiskie; and the baggage was a little behind the foot in the campe where they had lodged the night before. K L

The battell betwixt prince Alexander and the Vayuod Stephano.

The tyrant Stephano hauing diſpoſed his armie into diuers ſquadrons, began about nine of the clocke in the morning to play with his cannon vpon Alexanders armie, who found that the Generall of the Artillerie had kept his promiſe, for moſt of the bullets flew ouer his men and hurt them not; vpon which confidence hee commaunded the Coſſackes to charge the Tartarians which were aduanced, whom they ſoone defeated. At the ſame inſtant two thouſand light horſe gaue charge to the Hungarian foot men which guarded Stephanos cannon, and in an inſtant cut moſt of them in pieces, and the reſt yeelded themſelues; ſo as Alexander became maſter of his cannon. The tyrant ſeeing his Infanterie in danger to be defeated and his cannon loſt, cauſed a battallion of three thouſand Valachian and Moldauian horſemen to aduance, who without doubt had recouered the cannon, but the generous prince Coreskie with his Polonian Launciers charged them ſo furiouſly in the flanke, as that they ſlew almoſt the one halfe of them vpon the place, and put the reſt that remained to rout. Preſently after this followed another ſquadron, the which Coreskie perceiuing, M

A he wisely retired towards his campe, seeing his men wearied and tyred with the slaughter of their enemies, and not able to maintaine the fight without some rest. Then came prince Alexander and Visnouiskie who was his faithfull guide, with the rest of his horsemen to incounter this last battalion of the enemie, whereunto they went with greater courage, for that they were assured the Vayuod Stephano was there present, which charge continued for the space of a quarter of an houre, during which time prince Coreskie had leisure to take breath, and to gather togither what possibly hee could of those of his partie, to succour them that were then in fight, who were almost tired, and prince Alexander farre ingaged. But seeing these vnexpected succours, hee and his men recouered their forces, and their
B enemies were so much amazed at it, as that all them that remained aliue were put to rout and fled. Stephanos army defeated.

But Stephano (being naturally a coward) apprehending blowes, had retired himselfe to the rest of his footmen, who had not yet come to fight, making a shew that he would rather die with them than flie away; but seeing the euent of this last charge, and his horsemen all in rout, hee soone resolued to saue himselfe by flight, hauing neuer giuen one stroke in this battell. The footmen which remained being about foure thousand men, seeing the successe of the battell yeelded to the mercie of the victors, and cried out God saue Alexander Vayuod of MOLDAVIA. The day of the victorie prince Alexander made his entrie into the citie of YAS, hauing the princes Coreskie and Visnouiskie on either side, after whom
C followed his whole armie. Entring into the castle hee was there proclaimed Prince and Vayuod of MOLDAVIA by all the Nobles and Boyers of the countrie, the which hee would neuer accept vntill that time. The next day prince Alexander vnderstanding that a great number of the chiefest of the inhabitants of YAS were fled into the mountaines and forrests to attend the euents of these troubles, hee sent certaine Boyers to inuite them to returne backe againe (with all assurance) to their houses, causing part of his armie to dislodge, and to bee quartered in the countrie thereabouts; and there were one thousand and fiue hundred foot, and fiue hundred horse (vnder the leading of prince Coreskie) sent to the citie of VASSELLOY, for that Stephano had fled that way, and might returne backe againe into MOLDAVIA. As for the Artillerie some were sent into POLONIA, D and some were put into the fort of COCHINA, the which is as it were the Arsenall of MOLDAVIA. The flight of Stephano. Alexander proclaimed prince of Moldauia.

At the same time prince Alexander knowing that it was no lesse glorie to preserue than to get, hee called the chiefe Noblemen of his Court to counsell, to resolue what was fit to doe to maintaine him in his estate, which hee had newly gotten by the sword: where it was concluded among other things, that he should speedily send an Embassadour to the Grand Seignior, to let him vnderstand that he had neuer any intent to take armes against his maiestie, nor to withdraw MOLDAVIA from his obedience; but that hee had beene sought vnto being in POLONIA, and inuited by the Boyers of MOLDAVIA, for the vnspeakable cruelties of the Vayuod Stephano, who had resolued to root out the nobilitie
E of the said countrie, hauing put many of the chiefe to death without any occasion. They had also charge to giue the Sultan to vnderstand, that when as his maiestie aduanced Stephano to be Vayuod of MOLDAVIA, he had falsely suggested that he was sonne to a prince of MOLDAVIA, that he was not truely aduertised by his Bassaes and Councellours, that his predecessor had promised to the deceased father of prince Alexander, and to prince Simeon his vncle, that after his decease his sonnes should succeed him in the said estate, if they shewed not themselues vnworthie, and did pay the yearely tribute of fortie thousand Chequines, which tribute since the death of Ieremie had beene offered by prince Constantine his eldest sonne, to Houssine Aga, when as hee was sent to settle the said Stephano, as also that prince Alexander promised to pay it hereafter; and if need should be, he would giue prince Bogdan his brother as a sure and certaine pledge for the performance of his promises during the

The Embassadours hauing receiued these instructions, they tooke their iourney speedily to CONSTANTINOPLE: But in steed of passing through THRACE which was their directest course, they were forced to go by TRANSYLVANIA fearing to be hindred by the men of Prince Alexanders embassaders put to death by Stephano.

of warre which then troubled all THRACE. Comming to BVDA they went to ſalute the G Baſſa which commanded there, who being a ſpeciall friend to Stephano put them in priſon, violating the law of Nations obſerued by the moſt barbarous; and afterwards he ſent them to BRAILLE whither the tyrant Stephano had fled. They ſay he gaue 15000 Chequinos in recompence to the Baſſa, and to reuenge himſelfe in ſome ſort of prince Alexander in the perſons of his Embaſſadors, he cauſed their heads to be cut off one night after ſupper, and their bodies to be caſt into the Danowe. The death of theſe embaſſadours were very preiudiciall to prince Alexander, by meanes whereof the Grand Seignior was not truely aduerti-ſed of what had paſt in MOLDAVIA, nor receiued the complements, offers, and ſubmiſſion of prince Alexander, ſo as he was wonderfully incenſed againſt him, and ſware his ruine, as H you ſhall heare hereafter.

Stephano hauing receiued foure thouſand men from Michna prince of VALACHIA, and Stephano returnes into Moldauia. gathered together the reliques of his ſcattered armie, he marcht toward VALACHIA; wher-of prince Alexander being aduertiſed, he ſent prince Coreskie with ſix thouſand horſe Polo-nians and Coſſackes to TICOVCH a ſtrong frontier towne to guard that paſſage: And prince Alexander and Viſnowiskie, they ſtaied at YAS with the reſt of the armie to preſerue the countrie, and to preuent all alterations in fauour of Stephano, who had ſome intelligences. Within few daies after, the prince had newes that the inhabitants of HORREOVA (a countrie in MOLDAVIA containing about fifteene or ſixteene French leagues in circuit) were in armes, and had ioyned with a great troupe of Tartarians to come and inueſt I him, knowing well that prince Coreskie was otherwiſe imployed with part of the Polonian armie. Alexander ſtayed not to haue theſe rebels come to YAS; but ſent Viſnowiskie his brother in law with ſuch forces as hee could draw together to incounter with them. They
The inhabitants of Horreoua defeated with the Tartarians. met together within two leagues of the citie, where Viſnowiskie charged the Tartarians with ſuch furie, as halfe of them were ſlaine vpon the place, and the reſt of them fled: There were a great number of priſoners taken, and all the poore inhabitants of HORREOVA were brought vnto YAS in token of triumph. The dead being numbred, there were found about eight hundred Tartarians and others ſlaine, and of the Polonians onely fiftie, and ſome hundred hurt.

Prince Alexander hauing receiued newes of this defeat was wonderfully glad, and went K preſently to horſebacke with his companie of French, which he had onely reſerued about him, to goe and meet with Viſnowiskie, and to congratulate his happie victorie. This being done with many complements and imbracings, he caſt his eye vpon the poore inhabitants of HORREOVA, whom they led like a troupe of ſheepe, and had ſuch commiſeration on them, as he preſently ſent them backe againe, hauing taken their oath of fidelitie, hoping that this his clemencie would draw the moſt factious to obedience, hauing formerly tried the oppreſſions of a moſt cruell prince. Prince Alexander hauing giuen thankes to God for this new and vnexpected victorie, he ſent a gentleman vnto prince Coreskie to aduertiſe him thereof, who at the ſame inſtant was buſie to diſpoſe of his troupes to meet with Stephano, who returned into MOLDAVIA. The incounter was in a plaine champaine, L hauing on the one ſide the riuer of Sirette, the which diuides MOLDAVIA from VALA-CHIA: the skirmiſh continued from ten of the clocke vntill it was noone with like aduan-tage; but prince Coreskie being aduertiſed that Stephano was in a ſquadron of horſe which was ſome two hundred paces diſtant from him: he ioyned vnto his troupe foure hundred Gerbeys who were well armed, and led by a verie valiant captaine, with the which hee charged him with ſuch violence and furie as he forced them to giue backe, yet fighting in ſuch ſort, as the euent ſeemed to bee doubtfull: the which being diſcouered by another of the him, as Stephano and his horſemen were forced to flie, whom the prince purſued and cut in pieces. Stephano eſcaped with a troupe which he had reſerued rather for the guard of his per- M ſon than to fight. Prince Coreskie at his returne from the chace of his enemies, cauſed the dead to be numbred, where he found that of Stephanos ſide were three thouſand and foure hundred men ſlaine vpon the place, beſides thoſe that were priſoners and wounded; and of his part onely three hundred and fiftie.

Preſently

A Presently after this victorie, the season of the yeare being cold (it being the twelueth of Nouember) prince Coreskie put his troupes into garrison, and returned with one hundred and fiftie horse to YAS, where he was receiued with much honour and ioy. The princesse, mother to Alexander, was yet in POLAND, but being aduertised of her sonnes fortunate successe, she returned to YAS, and brought with her prince Bougdan her youngest sonne, with Alexandrina her daughter, who was yet to marrie. At whose arriuall there was great feasting and ioy; then they began to treate of a marriage betwixt prince Coreskie and the princesse Alexandrina, the which had beene then consummated, if Bellona had not opposed it, stirring vp new and more powerfull armies than the precedent, to exercise the vertues and
B vallours of the said princes, and to trie the patience of the two louers, who loued one another reciprocally from their youth.

A false alarme giuen to Alexander.

To continue the deduction of new affaires which troubled the quiet of the said princes more than euer, you must vnderstand that about the end of Nouember this yeare 1615 they were aduertised that Michna prince of VALACHIA with a Bassa called Hebraim, came against them with an armie of fortie thousand men, Turkes, Tartarians, and Valachians, to succour the Vayuod Stephano: and moreouer that Bethlem Gabor prince of TRANSYLVANIA, had charge from the Grand Seigniour to arme against them, and to assaile them, which in effect was a false alarme; for the said Bassa had beene sent by the Grand Seigniour to bring Caphtanes (which are roabes of cloth of gold which the Grand Seigniour doth vsually send in fa-
C uour to princes that are vnder his power) both to Michna and Stephano, who he held to be in peaceable possession of MOLDAVIA; but not with any armie nor with an intent to make warre against the said princes; for he was yet ignorant what had passed against Stephano.

An embassador from prince Alexander to prince Michna

Notwithstanding the princes holding this aduertisement to be true, assembled a counsell of the chiefe noblemen in court, where it was resolued, that an Embassadour should bee speedily sent to prince Michna, both to know his intent, and to discouer whether he marcht toward MOLDAVIA and with what forces. This charge was giuen vnto a braue gentleman of POLONIA called Boyartstkie, who parted presently from YAS, and being entred into VALACHIA hee vnderstood that prince Michna was then in his towne of BOVZA, some twentie French leagues distant from the frontiers of MOLDAVIA. The Embassador being
D arriued demaunded audience before Michna, by whom he was sent vnto the Bassa, who at his first entrance (without hearing the subiect of his embassage) demaunded, who had made his master Alexander so bold, as to carrie armes in the countrie of the Grand Seigniour without his authoritie; for the which he should be punisht, and those that did assist him: commanding the embassadour presently to be put in yrons, as if he had beene a thiefe or some miserable catife. The embassadours seruants seeing how they entreated their master, escaped as they could, fearing the like; who returning to YAS, enformed prince Alexander what had past; assuring him that Michna had no armie readie, nor any intent to enter into MOLDAVIA at that time. The Bassa disdaining to speake any more to the said Embassadour, he gaue charge to some of his officers to examine him particularly of all matters concerning Alex-
E ander, and what forces hee had: And within few daies after he returned to CONSTANTINOPLE, leading the said Embassadour thither with him. But as soone as they were arriued, they sent the Embassadour vnto the Diuano, where hee was againe examined by a Visier, and in the end he was condemned by him to the gallies there to remaine perpetually. So little accompt doe these barbarous people make to violate the Law of Nations, especially with Christians, presuming that all the world should bow vnto them, as if they were Gods vpon earth.

Alexanders embassador put in prison by the Bassa.

Prince Alexander sendeth an embassador to Bethlem Gabor.

There was another Embassadour sent by prince Alexander vnto Bethlem Gabor who was prince of TRANSYLVANIA, being at FVRSVAR or ALBA IVLIA, whom he receiued verie courteously; to whom the Embassadour deliuered the subiect of his charge.
F That prince Alexander his master had beene aduertised that he made some leuie of men to ioyne with Michna prince of VALACHIA, and to make warre against him, the which he could not easily belieue, for that he had made profession of friendshippe to his deceased father, and had no cause now to leaue it; intreating and coniuring him, not to meddle in the affaires which hee had to decide with Michna; and that in requitall (if any occasion were offered to serue him) hee would imploie all his meanes. The Embassadour G hauing ended his speech, he deliuered his princes letters of credit: To whom Bethlem Gabor made this aunswere, That hee neuer had any intent to take armes, nor to attempt any thing against prince Alexander, whose father was his true friend; neither would hee euer giue any cause to discontinue this loue and friendship betwixt them, whereof he would giue good proofe in all occasions, especially in this subiect now in question. The Embassadour was much satisfied with this answere, the which was also confirmed by letters; yet he afterwards leuied forces against prince Alexander, but he would not ioine with Michna his armie.

To returne to the course of our historie, presently after the Bassa his departure from H CICOVCH to returne to CONSTANTINOPLE, Prince Michna sent an Embassadour to Alexander, with letters by the which he excused himselfe, for the ill vsage of his Embassadour by the Bassa, protesting that he was much grieued, and that it was not with his consent that hee had carried him with him, promising him to imploie his best meanes to mediate his deliuerie. Moreouer that hee was not ignorant what authoritie and power the Graund Seigniour had ouer him, whom he might not resist, nor by consequence his Bassaes; that hee had no armie on foot, as he was giuen to vnderstand, and that his desligne was not to support the cause of the Vayuod Stephano, vnlesse he were forced by the commaundment of the Graund Seigniour. And whereas he intreated him to deliuer his enemie Stephano into his hands, he could not do it, vnlesse he should violate the lawes of hospitalitie, in betraying his friend who had fled vnto him for succour, and withall he should incurre the indignation of the Sultan, and he in danger to be dispossest of his owne estate, hauing no sufficient meanes to maintaine himselfe against so great a power. Prince Alexander hauing heard this Embassadour, and receiued an answere from the Prince of TRASYLVANIA, by the aduice of his councell, dismissed all his footmen, and part of the Cossackes, retaining only fiue or sixe thousand men with him during the Winter. Prince Visnowiskie poisoned by a priest.

About this time there was one of the most cursed and impious acts committed that euer was heard of. Prince Visnowiskie who was a Protestant of the Greeke Church, hauing prepared at Christmas to receiue the Communion after their manner, the priest (who had vsually serued him in that deuotion, being corrupted with money by his enemies) poisoned the K bread, which the prince hauing receiued, he fell suddenly sicke, and his torments were so violent, as he died the next day. This bred a suspition that he had beene poisoned; whereupon the priest was apprehended, who presently confessed that he was guiltie, and had beene prouoked by his enemies. As his offence was terrible, being committed by a man of that coat, who had made vse of so reuerent a Sacrament, to poison a prince beloued of all men for his rare vertues; so his punishment was verie seuere and long: being bound in a chaire made of copper wire, and a fire made round about him, so as he was heard for twelue houres crying out fearefully for the insupportable paines which he endured. Whilest that prince Alexander and his whole court mourned for this fatall and vnexpected accident, there arriued a spie which he had sent into VALACHIA, to obserue the actions of prince Michna, who gaue him L to vnderstand that there was a Bassa arriued called Skinder, with a great and powerfull armie, and that Stephano was there in like manner, who pressed them daily to march into MOLDAVIA; and to begin the warre, he sent foure hundred men to surprise the towne of BERLADA, whereas prince Coreskie had left part of his men in garrison during the Winter, who keeping bad guard were surprised, and most of them cut in pieces, which so puft vp Stephano with pride, as he assured himselfe of an easie victorie. But prince Alexander hearing of Stephanos men defeated by the Cossackes.

this defeat, hee sent foure hundred Cossackes, who made such speed, as within three dayes after they arriued at BERLADA a towne not walled, no more than the rest, where hauing set fire in many places, they forced his men to come foorth, cutting them in pieces, and the rest were burnt; so as there escaped not aboue fiue or six to carrie this bad newes vnto their M master, who was much afflicted.

At the same instant, when as the Cossackes were sent vpon this expedition, prince Coreskie desiring to bee reuenged for the defeat of his men, tooke two thousand and fiue hundred choice horse, and put himselfe speedily into VASSELLOY, fearing the garrison hee had left there

A there would be in like manner ſurpriſed: whereof the Baſſa being aduertiſed, by ſome of the countrie men, he ſent his ſonne (being twelue or thirteene yeares old) and gaue him an old Turke of great experience for his conductor, with ſeuen thouſand men, holding this a good occaſion to get reputation to his ſonne. Prince Coreskie being aduertiſed of his march by ſome Moldauians, and that they ſhould ſurprize them early in the morning, knowing that they were of neceſſitie to paſſe a bridge of wood ouer a riuer that runnes by the towne, hee diſpoſed his men in ſuch ſort as that the enemie could hardly diſcouer them, ſome of them were lodged within VASSELLOY, and the reſt were couered with a little mountaine that adioyned vpon the towne: when as ſome of the Turkes had paſſed the bridge, two ſquadrons
B ſallied from the towne, and charged their foreward ſo furiouſly, as they were in a manner all put to the ſword, and amongſt them the conductor of the whole troupe, the which was no difficult thing to execute; for that the Turkes who had marched in a manner all night, to arriue early in the morning, were benumbed and halfe dead with cold; the reſt of the Turkes which had not yet paſt hearing the noiſe of this hote alarme, durſt not aduaunce, but retired ſpeedily, fearing perchance that the Baſſaes ſonne might bee loſt as well as his conductor. Prince Coreskie purſued them vnto a village foure leagues diſtant from VASSELLOY, killing and taking priſoners all he found in the way. Among the priſoners there was one who gaue it out that he was neere kinſman vnto the Baſſa, who being brought to prince Alexander, he receiued him verie courteouſly, and gaue him a garment fit for him, hauing been ſtript
C of his owne, he alſo gaue him a horſe, and ſent him backe vnto the Baſſa with a good conuoy, to whom he ſent a letter, by the which he intreated him not to aduance in fauour of Stephano, promiſing that if the graund Seignior would ſuffer him to enioy MOLDAVIA quietly, he would be moſt faithful vnto him afterwards, and pay him the yearely accuſtomed tribute: wherof the Baſſa made no great account; for he was wonderfully incenſed, both for his ſons bad ſucceſſe in this enterpriſe, and for the death of his Turkiſh captaine.

The Baſſaes kinſman taken

Vpon the day of this victorie, prince Alexander ſent fifteene hundred horſe to fortifie prince Coreskie, whereof eight hundred were lodged in a certaine Borough ſixe leagues from TICOVTH, whereas the Baſſa and Michna were then with their armie, being about fiue and twentie thouſand men. Theſe eight hundred men neglecting their guards, did nothing but
D drinke drunke, and moleſt their hoſtes with all kind of inſolencies, and forcing their wiues and daughters, which made them take a reſolution to be reuenged, and to that end they called vnto them certain Boyers out of the country, who chuſing their time, cut all their throats when they were aſleep, and moſt of them drunke.

800 of prince Alexanders men ſlaine by their hoſtes for their inſolencies

About the end of this yeare prince Alexander called a generall councell, whereas the princeſſe his mother, prince Coreskie, and all the chiefe noblemen and captaines aſſiſted, where it was reſolued that they ſhould retire to COCHINA, being thirtie French leagues off; for that it was the ſtrongeſt place and the beſt furniſhed of all MOLDAVIA, and withal they ſhould be far from their enemies, and neere vnto POLONIA. According to this reſolution, prince Alexander parted the next day with his whole armie, and came in foure daies march to Co-
E CHINA, in the extreameſt cold ſeaſon that could be; hauing lodged his troupes, the princes ſent diuers gentlemen to all their friends and confederates to coniure them to come ſpeedily to ſuccour them; and in the meane time they gaue order to make prouiſion of victuals, and of all other things neceſſarie for their armie. The Baſſa being aduertiſed of this retreat, he marched with Michna and Stephano towards YAS, notwithſtanding the extreamitie of the cold, which was ſo violent that many dyed vpon the way; whereupon they ſtaied vntill the time was more milde.

Prince Alexander retires to Cochina.

In the beginning of March, the lord of Tiſcheuich came vnto prince Alexander with 3500 Coſſackes, and within few dayes after arriued the lord Potoskie, nephew to him who had been taken at the firſt battell, and carried priſoner to CONSTANTINOPLE, who brought F with him a troupe of fifteene hundred Polonians well armed, there came alſo other ſuccors vnto him, ſo as by the end of that moneth the princes armie was tenne or twelue thouſand ſtrong foot and horſe.

selues within halfe a league of the towne of ESPANOCHA, wheras Michna his Tartarians were lodged: they were discouered and presently inuested by them and by a great number of Turks; and although that there were little hope to resist so great a multitude, yet Alexanders men (who had alwayes beene accustomed to vanquish) behaued themselues very valiantly, desiring rather to die, than to yeeld basely without giuing proofes of their valour. This fight continued from tenne of the clock in the morning, vntill night, and of the whole troupe there escaped but twelue, seuen Polonians, and fiue French, the rest were either slaine or taken prisoners, among the which was the captaine of the French companie called Mountespin, whom they would haue sent with the rest vnto the grand Seigniors gallies: But Stephano preserued him vpon promise that he would doe him good seruice. Heere fortune (which had hitherto beene fauourable vnto prince Alexander) began to shew her inconstancie, to teach princes not to runne rashly into dangers, although they haue had some aduauntage ouer their enemies.

Iesuits at Constantinople accused.

At CONSTANTINOPLE about the end of August this yeare 1616, enuie, the most furious of all the winds that shake the affaires of the world, stirred vp a horrible tempest, whose violent gusts fell daungerously vpon the Iesuites setled at PERA, by the Sultans permission, at the persuasion of Henrie the fourth, the French king; and labours to cast them vpon the rockes, where they might suffer shipwracke, shamefull to their order, and preiudiciall to the Christians, which liue in the midst of Mahometisme. And to ruine them without all hope of help or relieſe, they accused them before the graund Visier, to be spies to SPAINE; to giue absolution to renegadoes; to baptize Turkes; to conceale fugitiue slaues, and to send them into Christendome; and withall they obiected the doctrine of killing of kings, if they were tyrants, the which had been rashly written by a Spaniard of their coat: all which crimes are commonly punished at CONSTANTINOPLE with death. They seized vpon their persons, and lodged them in a dungeon, they were sixe in number, that is to say, Francis Bouton, Denis Guilier, Dominick Maurice of CHIO, and Iohn Baptista Iobert their superiour, all foure priests, and two assistants, and with them a Franciscan Frier, vicar to the Patriarke of CONSTANTINOPLE. A suspition of danger in an estate is easily beleeued vpon the least accident. In the meane time the Emperours Embassadour came to CONSTANTINOPLE, to renew the truce; they entred with their drummes beating and their ensignes displayed. They which thought to erect trophies to their glorie by their ruine of the Iesuites, made vse of this entrie, and gaue false aduertisements to the Seraglio, that there were in CONSTANTINOPLE, and at PERA many thousands of Christians disguised in the habits of Greekes and Turkes, which came with this Embassadour, with an intent to put that in execution which the Iesuites had projected. Moreouer, they informed the grand Visier, and the Muphti, that the Churches in PERA, and the Embassadours houses were full of armes; and that now when as the Turkes estate, and especially CONSTANTINOPLE, was vnprouided of forces, hauing imploied their armies in diuers places, and at one instant, as in POLAND, PERSIA, and both the seas, that they meant to draw the Greekes into rebellion, and giue an entrie to the Cossackes, by the blacke sea. The Sultan and his Bassaes tooke an alarme, they commanded euery man to weare the habit of his owne nation, with a prohibition to weare any hat except the Frankes, and they to weare a Grecian habit; they also inrolled all the Christians in CONSTANTINOPLE and PERA. But the Sultan did not thinke his citie of CONSTANTINOPLE free from the danger of surprise by this diligent search, but hee would seeke his assurance in the blood of Christians: so as he commaunded that all the Franckes should be slaine without exception. But yet this commaundement tooke no effect, by reason of the remonstrances which the graund Visier and the Muphti made him, representing vnto him that by this crueltie, he should draw vpon his estate a daungerous warre from all the Christian princes in generall. But all this freed him not from feare, he walkes all night on horsebacke vp and down the citie contrarie to his custome, and he causeth a Frier, vicar to the Patriarke, who had been taken with the Iesuites, to be executed in his presence; and he doth expressely forbid the passage from CONSTANTINOPLE to PERA, and from PERA to CONSTANTINOPLE. During this prohibition, the French Embassador had past from PERA to the citie, to sollicite the Iesuites libertie. At his returne he found the passage stopt, he goes vnto the Muphti, and leaues his people in the

The Turke commands all the Christians to be slaine.

A the meane time at the ſea ſide (for it is the cuſtome, to goe to the ſoueraigne of Mahomets law with a ſmall traine) during the time of his being there, a multitude of people ranne downe to the ſhore, to ſee theſe men, thinking for certaine, that they went to put them to death: They lamenting their miſerable fortune, and the Turks charging them furiouſly with iniuries, as the men whom they thought practiſed by conſpiracie their ruine. But the graund Viſier hauing written with his owne hand, and ſent one of his people to them that kept the paſſage, the Embaſſadour with his whole traine was ſuffered to paſſe to PERA, but he found the ſtorme as raging at PERA as from whence he came: for one night after, the people of that A tumult at Pera.
B place fell into ſuch a furie, as it was to be feared the law of nations would haue been violated by the inſolencie of ſome furious people, although the ſubiect were of ſmall importance. About fiue hundred paces from the French Embaſſadors quarter, there fell out a diſpute in a lodging, betwixt ſome who ſpent the night in ſome kind of imployment: the Turkes that dwelt neere, being awaked with this noiſe, ranne to armes, and troupt together in the ſtreet, being in all 1000 men armed, crying out that this noiſe came from the Franckes, (that is to ſay from the Chriſtians in the Weſt, as Italians, French, Spaniſh, Engliſh, and others) who meant to riſe; and they reſolued to force the Embaſſadours houſes, and to put all to fire and ſword, if ſome better aduiſed of the troupe had not perſuaded them to delay the execution vntill day, the which being come, the French Embaſſadour had meanes to get the Sultan to C interpoſe his ſoueraigne authoritie, to bridle the inſolencie of a multitude inconſideratly incenſed. Such is the daunger, in the which many times the miniſters of Chriſtian princes find themſelues, who for their maſters ſeruice liue at the mercie of a nation barbarouſly furious, as the Turkiſh.

The Ieſuites in the meane time continued priſoners in the dungeon, vntill that the Baron of Sanſy Embaſſadour for FRANCE, had let the graund Viſier ſee their innocencie, and pro- The Ieſuits ſet at libertie.
cured their libertie, and the Sultan by his letters patents did publiſh the falſhood of the malitious accuſations inuented againſt them: but to auoid the furie of a multitude blind in their paſſions, and dangerous in their furie, they went to ſea to returne to FRANCE: But after they had ſoiourned ſometime at the Dardanels, they were againe committed to priſon, by reaſon
D of ſome certaine aduertiſement that was giuen to the Sultan of the ſame ſubſtance: The Sultan informed himſelfe truely of their probitie, gaue them their libertie, calling backe two to PERA, to liue there with the ſame priuiledges they formerly had, and ſuffered the reſt to returne into FRANCE.

Alexander prince of MOLDAVIA hauing loſt a thouſand horſe neere vnto COCHINA, the laſt yeare as you haue heard, the Baſſa and Stephano were puft vp with this good ſucceſſe; but Michna had no ioy of it, who hearing that the princes attended him at COCHINA, with a re- Michna ſtaies to fight with the Polonians.
ſolution to defend themſelues, remembring that a certaine Italian making profeſſion to foretell future things, had told him, That if he euer came to fight with the Polonians, he would be in danger of his life. Wherefore by the aduice of his Chancellor and Campe-maſter, called E Spaterlecha, he pretended, that hee had receiued newes from his lieutenant, that there was a great troupe of Tartarians entred into VALACHIA, and ſpoyled the countrey; vpon which pretext he tooke leaue of the Baſſa and returned, leauing all his ſouldiors in the armie, reſeruing only an hundred horſe for his guard. Being in VALACHIA, Stephano wrote vnto him that he had defeated the Polonians in battaile, in the which there were ſlaine ſixe thouſand men vpon the place, and had taken a great number of priſoners, which they meant to ſend to the graund Seignior, all which was but a meere inuention to mocke Michna, and to make him ſorie that hee was not in the action: whereupon he was ſo much diſcontented, as he cauſed the heades of his Chauncellour and Campe-maſter to be cut off, for their bad counſell, charging them that they had ſome ſecret intelligence with the Polonians.

F About the end of March, the Baſſa with Stephano, and a Tartarian prince called Monoza, reſolued to aduaunce with their whole armie (being twentie thouſand men) towards COCHI- The Baſſa and Stephano defeated at Cochina.
NA, and being within two leagues, they made a ſtand a whole day to refreſh their men. In the meane time the princes put their armie in order of battell, in a little plaine within a quarter of a league of COCHINA, leauing 1000 choice horſe within the town vnder the command of prince Coreskie, aſſuring themſelues that the Turkes would not faile to campe betwixt the

towne and the princes armie, that if they were defeated, they might haue no meanes to retire into the fort, which was held impregnable. The princes drew eight pieces of cannon out of the fort, which they planted within a trench which was couered with a wood. The Bassa on the other side thought that he had the princes at his mercie, being aduertised that they had not halfe so many men in their armie; early in the morning hee caused his men to march in good order, who arriued neere to COCHINA by seuen of the clocke in the morning, where hauing made a stand to discouer the princes armie, he went and encamped betwixt them and the towne, as it had beene foreseene. His men being put in order, the Tartarians who had a great desire to be reuenged of the Cossackes, who had defeated them in many incounters, intreated to haue the point, the which was graunted, and the trumpets sounding they aduanced towards a battalion of Cossackes, nothing distrusting the cannon which was planted on that side, and not seene. Comming within the shot, they presently played vpon them, and ouerthrew a great number of the Tartarians and terrified the rest, the which the Cossacks perceiuing, they charged them furiously, and cut the rest in pieces, and so retired towards their armie, seeing another squadron of Valachians and Moldauians come to succour the Tartarians. The lord of Tischeuisch with his troupe of fifteene or sixteene hundred horse well armed, went to encounter the said squadron, which aduanced brauely towards the princes cannon. The combate was long without any shew of aduantage, which made the Marshall of the Turkes armie to send three thousand Turkes to succour them: and the princes caused a squadron of Cossackes and Moldauians to aduaunce, who carried themselues so valiantly, as they forced the Turkes to retire aboue an hundred paces. Then prince Alexander cried out, Now my companions, behold the enemie is in disorder, let vs charge them resolutely, and the victorie is certaine. After which he aduaunced with the rest of his armie, commaunding two cannons to bee shot off together, for a signe to prince Coreskie, that hee might sallie foorth, and charge the Turkes reereward, as it had beene resolued: But hee stayed not for the signall, beeing alreadie aduaunced aboue three hundred paces, fearing that the partie would bee ended without him, or that hee should faile at need.

The Bassa seeing this stratageme which hee feared not, and the bad successe of his men, which hee had sent to fight, and that he was charged both before and behind, he began to be amazed, and hauing caused a squadron of two thousand horse, Turkes and Valachians to aduaunce, to second his other troupes, hee retired apart with Stephano, (who was no lesse afraid than himselfe) with the rest of the Turkish Cauallarie, to attend the euent of the battell. There was neuer a more furious combate seene (which continued for the space of two houres) full of fearefull howlings of Turkes, who in the end fainted, seeing no succours come vnto them: whereas if the Bassa and the cowardly Stephano had ioyned with them, they had without doubt fortified their carriages, and renewed their forces, and by all apparance wonne the victorie, which they lost beyond all mans expectation. When as the Bassa and Stephano saw that their forces were in rout, and no meanes to draw them againe together, they began to make a retrait with aboue two thousand horse, which had not yet fought. In the meane time the princes Tischeuisch and Coreskie (like two thunderbolts of warre) cut all in pieces they could meet; and fearing lest they should make a new head, the princes drew all their men together, and made a stand vpon the place of battell, not suffering their souldiors to go to the spoile, before they were assured that the enemie was retired in great haste, fearing the princes would haue pursued them; the which they would willingly haue done, if their men and horses had not been almost tired in the former battell, in which there was slaine aboue 12000 men besides the wounded and prisoners.

Flight of the Bassa and Stephano.

Prince Alexander being returned to COCHINA with the other princes and noblemen, they gaue thankes to God for the victorie they had obtained against the Turkes and their confederates; and there was much ioy with the Princesse and all the Ladies, who were retired into the fort, attending the euent of this fearefull battell. Prince Coreskie burned with desire to enioy his Mistresse, whom hee loued as his owne life; so as by a free consent of all parties, they were married within two dayes after the victorie, to the great content of all the Court.

Prince Coreskie marries with the Princesse Alexandrina.

Whilest

A Whileſt that the princes began to enioy the fruits of their victorie, the Baſſa and wretched Stephano returned to YAS, but finding no ſafetie there, they parted preſently, the Baſſa to CONSTANTINOPLE, and the tyrant into VALACHIA to prince Michna, who was his onely ſupport, notwithſtanding that hee had mocked him apparantly. But before this wretch departed from YAS (hauing no hope euer to returne againe) hee cauſed the towne to bee ſet on fire in manie places; ſo as of two and twentie thouſand houſes, there were not aboue ſixe hundred vntouched. The princes hauing aduice heereof in the beginning of Aprill, they marched ſpeedily thither, where finding it ſo deſolate, they reſolued to purſue Stephano into VALACHIA, and puniſh him according to his deſeruing. The next day they A defeat of 400 of Michnas men.

B marched towards VALACHIA, being to paſſe the riuer of Siretta, there being on the other ſide a borough in which Michna had foure hundred men in garriſon, to keepe the frontiers. The princes arriuing at this place, the garriſon put themſelues in defence, but they were ſoone forced and cut in pieces, ſo as there eſcaped not one, and as for the inhabitants, they were well intreated, hauing made no reſiſtance, and withall they hated Michna for the vexations they receiued from the ſaid garriſon. The armie hauing reſted there three dayes, aduaunced with all ſpeed towards the citie of BONZA, whereas Michna then remained with wretched Stephano, who had no care but to make good cheere. The armie being come within a league of BONZA, it was diſcouered by ſome countreymen, who ranne to aduertiſe their

C prince, wiſhing him to ſaue himſelfe ſpeedily, for that they had diſcouered the Polonian armie neere the citie. Michna was readie to ſit downe to dinner, hauing inuited Stephano to accompanie him: but he was ſo amazed at this vnexpected comming of the princes, as hee ranne himſelfe to his ſtable, and mounted vpon the firſt horſe he could finde, without ſadle, and ſo tooke his way towards TERGOVIST, being followed by few of his people, one of which gaue him his own horſe, which was better furniſhed, and as for Stephano, hauing ſadled his owne horſe, he fled all alone towards NICOPOLIS. Prince Michna and Stephano flie from Bonza

The princes being entred BONZA without any reſiſtance, they were wonderfully grieued that they had not found Stephano, which was their whole deſigne, and that prince Michna (to whom they intended no harme) had beene ſo amazed. The armie at their firſt entrance

D ſpoyled the citie, which the princes could not hinder, nor yet the rauiſhing of many wiues and virgines, which drew the wrath of God vpon them, and in all appearance was the true cauſe of the miſeries which afterward befell the princes. During their abode at BONZA to refreſh their men, manie Boyers or Noblemen of the countrey (deſiring to ſhake off the yoke of prince Michnas command, who gouerned inſolently) came vnto prince Alexander, beſeeching him to ſtay in VALACHIA, promiſing that the whole Nobilitie would willingly yeeld him all obedience and fidelitie. But the prince (hauing no intent to diſpoſſeſſe Michna) thanked them for their good will, the which the Boyers vnderſtanding, they told him that they would be glad (ſeeing hee refuſed it) that prince Cherbanne (who had been their Vayuod before Michna, and had beene expelled VALACHIA by Bethlem Gabor, and forced to Prince Alexander refuſeth the eſtate of Valachia.

E retire into GERMANIE to the Emperour) might returne and take vpon him the gouernement of VALACHIA, intreating him to giue him paſſage through MOLDAVIA if he preſented himſelfe, the which prince Alexander willingly graunted, deſiring much that prince Cherbanne were reſtored, for that Michna fauoured his enemy, and had himſelfe a deſigne vpon the eſtate of MOLDAVIA, which in the end he obtained.

Prince Michna being come to PLAYA, which is betwixt BONZA and TERGOVIST, hee ſtayed ſome dayes there attending his traine, during the which hee ſent ſpeedily to his wife being at TERGOVIST, willing her to goe with all ſpeed to NICOPOLIS: for that hee feared the princes would ſeize both vpon them and their eſtates, as they might eaſily haue done, if they had foreſeene what afterwards befell them. Michna being come to TERGOVIST, he Michna ſends an Embaſſador to prince Alexander.

F preſently ſent an Embaſſadour to prince Alexander, to know vpon what deſigne he had entred VALACHIA with an armie, hauing no cauſe; but contrariwiſe, that he had giuen good teſtimonie that he was his friend, for that hee would not aſſiſt the Baſſa and Stephano, when they purſued him to COCHINA, notwithſtanding that they were much ſtronger in ſhew; That if his intent were onely to ſeaze vpon Stephano, he aſſured him that hee was not with him, but was fled another way, promiſing that if hee could euer take him, hee would deliuer him him into his hands: intreating him withall to retire out of his eſtate, not ſuffering his armie to ſpoyle it any more, and that they might continue good friends. Prince Alexander receiued this Embaſſadour verie courteouſly, who hearing the ſubiect of his embaſſie, made anſwere, That hee had the day before ſent vnto his maſter to informe him of his intent, which was not to attempt any thing againſt his perſon nor eſtate, but onely to purſue Stephano, who had ſet fire on the citie of YAS before he parted; and to let Michna know, that he meant not to wrong him, nor to enrich himſelfe with any thing that was his: hee had ſent him backe his plate, with all his rich mooueables. Michnas Embaſſadour hauing thanked prince Alexander, returned to TERGOVIST, and found all true that the prince had ſaid; the which freed Michna from further feare. G

1500 Tartarians defeated by Troianoskie.

Before prince Alexanders departure from BONZA, he ſent the Lord Troianoskie with two thouſand horſe to purſue Stephano: but it was without effect, for he vnderſtood that hee had paſſed the riuer of Danowe with his wife, and a ſmall traine. At the ſame time a troupe of fifteene hundred Tartarians, being aduertiſed that the Polonians purſued Stephano only with a thouſand horſe, and that they were tyred with their long marches, aduaunced to charge them; but it was not with that ſucceſſe they expected: for Troianoskie diſcouering them a farre off in a plaine champion field, had leaſure to put his men into foure ſquadrons, and there attended them, who appraoching neere to diſcouer the number of the Polonians, would gladly returne without blows, but it was too late: for Troianoskie commanded two of his ſquadrons to charge them ſuddenly, ſo as within leſſe than a quarter of an houre they were defeated, and aboue foure hundred ſlaine vpon the place, the reſt fled the ſame way that they came: of the Polonians there were not aboue fiue and twentie ſlaine, and about fiftie hurt. H I

The inhabitants of Horreouа reuolt the ſecond time.

The princes had reſolued to leaue VALACHIA, forbidding all captaines and ſouldiors vpon paine of death to carrie away any Valachian of either ſexe with them, hearing they had ſeized vpon ſome, and meant to draw a ranſome from them: after which they began to march, and being vpon the way, they were aduertiſed that the inhabitants of HORREOVA, were againe reuolted and in armes, refuſing to acknowledge prince Alexander, or to pay the accuſtomed tribute, vnleſſe he would make it appeare that hee was confirmed by the graund Seigniour. Prince Coreskie was ſent thither with fiue thouſand men, whoſe comming did ſo amaze them, as they yeelded without any reſiſtance. This prince being loath to looſe any time, laid ſiege to the towne and fort of BIALIGRONT, ſeated vpon the riuer of Bohou, the which was held by the Tartarians Præcopences, in which fort there was a garriſon of Ianizaries, and many Boyers of MOLDAVIA, who defended themſelues valiantly, and made manie ſallies, in which they ſlew aboue three hundred of the princes men, and he himſelfe was in danger to bee taken, if he had not been ſpeedily deliuered by the Lord of Tiſcheuich and his troupe, who charged the Ianizaries ſo reſolutely, as they forced them to retire, leauing many of their men dead vpon the place. The prince ſeeing there was no hope to take the place without cannon, raiſed his ſiege and returned to YAS to prince Alexander. K

Hebrain Baſſa writes to prince Alexander.

Soone after Hebraym Baſſa wrote to prince Alexander (as if he had been his friend) giuing him to vnderſtand, that from thencefoorth he ſhould liue quietly in MOLDAVIA, for that the graund Seigniors Lieutenant generall or chiefe Viſier (from whom Stephano had alwaies drawne his chiefe ſupport) was in diſgrace, promiſing the prince to imploy himſelfe for him to his maſter, the which he did either to make him careleſſe of his owne ſtrength, or to draw ſome recompence or reward from him, if the graund Seigniour ſhould confirme him in MOLDAVIA, as there was ſome likelihood, ſeeing that Stephano had made himſelfe altogether vnworthie; as well by his flight, as by his wicked actions, which made him in the end ſo odious to the graund Seignior, as hee reſolued to ruine him. So as ſoone after they were aduertiſed, that the graund Seignior had giuen commaundement vnto the ſaid Baſſa to ſeize vpon Stephano, who had retired himſelfe to BRAHILE, and to bring him vnto him aliue or dead, with whatſoeuer did belong vnto him: the which he executed after this manner: The ſaid Baſſa marcht with all diligence towards BRAHILE, carrying a Chiaus with him, and being within foure or fiue leagues of the towne, he ſent one of his people to aduertiſe Stephano of his comming, and that he meant the next day to dine with him. Stephano (who diſtruſted nothing) L

Stephano in diſgrace with the Sultan. M

A nothing) holding the Visier to be still his friend, parted early in the morning to meet him, and comming neer him he alighted from his horse to do him reuerence, and the Bassa did the like, where after some little conference together, he drew out the commission he had to seize vpon his person, and to carrie him to CONSTANTINOPLE: the which Stephano perceiuing, he turned him to his seruants, and willed them to shift for themselues, for that he saw he went to his death. His men being retired, the Chiaus who had his mace in his hand, gaue him a blow betwixt the sholders, and then caused him to be bound hand & foot, and cast into a cart drawn by foure good horses, and in this manner they caried him to CONSTANTINOPLE, where being arriued, to auoid the punishment he had deserued, he denied his faith, & became a renegado: Stephano carried to Constantinople and turns Turke.

B and withal he became very poore and miserable: for at the same instant that he was taken, the Bassa sent to seize and carrie away whatsoeuer he had at BRAHILE and NICOPOLIS, where his wife remained, so as hee had nothing left him but the remorse of conscience that tormented him continually, for the barbarous cruelties which he had practised in MOLDAVIA. Some of his men returned to YAS, and there declared what had befallen Stephano in their presence, for which they generally gaue thanks vnto God, and were very ioyfull.

Soone after newes came to YAS, that the Sultan had appointed prince Michna to succeed Stephano in the principalitie of MOLDAVIA (which is verie much better than that of VALACHIA) and that he sent Skinder Bassa his generall in EVROPE, with a powerful army to settle the said Michna, and to expell Alexander. The which prooued so true, as on the 25 of Iune this

C yeare 1616, the said Bassa came to TERGOVIST, where prince Michna attended him, with great preparatiues both to receiue him, and to refresh his armie. The Bassa making his entrie into TERGOVIST, had amongst other things of note thirtie or fortie musicians on horse backe, playing vpon certain instruments almost like vnto gitternes, which made but silly musick, he had also many pages, who instead of clokes, ware the skinnes of leopards, lions, & tigres, as if they meant to terrifie the world, and his armie consisted of about 20000 men, some Turks, some Tartarians, to whom Michna ioyned his forces, hauing 10000 horse and foot, which he had drawn from VALACHIA and the neighbour countries. The Bassa being entred the castle whereas prince Michna attended him: after many complements, they entred into a great hall well appointed, where the Bassa presented him his letters patents, & a robe which his master Michna proclaimed prince of Moldania.

D had sent to Michna, which hee caused to be put on in the presence of all the noblemen of his court, proclaiming him prince and Vayuod of MOLDAVIA, with many ceremonies too long to relate. After which, prince Michna led the Bassa into another great hall where a feast was prepared, as well for himselfe, as for such as hee would admit to his table, Michna offering to serue the said Bassa, but he would not suffer him, causing him to sit downe right against him. On the second of Iuly they parted from TERGOVIST, and marcht into MOLDAVIA, whereof the Polonian princes were aduertised: but the princesse mother to Alexander maintained that the Bassa came only to bring the patents to prince Alexander her son, which dangerous opinion of hers grew by reason of the letters which Hebraim Bassa had sent to prince Alexander not remembring that it came from a Turk his sworn enemy, and therfore not to be credited,

E especially in a matter of that importance, so as she was the cause of their vtter ruine.

About this time the generall of the king of Poloniaes armie called Zolkelchy, enuying the honor which the Polonian princes had gotten by so many victories, & withall drawn by his The treachtrie of the generall of Polonia.

own priuat intrest, writ to prince Michna, and the Bassa, that if they would promise to procure the Sultan to aduance the eldest son of the deceased prince Simeon (who liued with him) to be prince of VALACHIA, whereof his father had bin formerly Vayuod, he would so weaken the princes armie, as they should be forced to yeeld or flie; whose demand being easily granted, this traitor writ to certain captains of the Cossacks, that they should leaue the princes armie, and come with all speed into POLAND, to accompany Vladislaus their kings son, who had bin chosen duke of MVSCOVIA, and meant to goe thither with a great armie by reason of some

F crosses, & they should be very wel paid. The Cossacks (who depend vpon the crown of POLAND, seruing those that promise most) began to mutinie, saying plainly, that if they had not mony speedily, they would retire into their country, yet concealing that they had bin called The Cossackes mutinie and leaue prince Alexander.

to any other seruice: and without any long stay there parted early in a morning about 8000, carying with them great store of oxen, sheepe, and other cattell, with all the spoiles they had gotten in the precedent victories.

After their example Bicho generall of prince Alexanders army, whether corrupted by bribes, or for that he had an apprehenſion of this powerfull armie which came againſt them, retired alſo ſecretly toward Michna and the Baſſa, being followed by 2000 horſe. This was a ſubiect of great amazement to the princes armie; and yet as if they had bin inchaunted by ſome deuilliſh charms, they could not reſolue to make a retrait, as they might eaſily haue done without danger. Many aduiſed prince Alexander to this courſe, euen prince Michna writ vnto him, aduiſing him to retire into POLONIA before that his armie approched neerer to YAS; the which he did for feare of the ſucceſſe wherof his falſe prophet had forewarned him, as we haue formerly obſerued: wherupon Alexander went to counſell on the 25 of Iuly, but they could not reſolue; the commanders and ſouldiors being much diuided, moſt of them demanding their pay, elſe they would not fight; the which they tooke for a pretext of their retrait. In the mean time the Tartarians which made the vauntgard of prince Michnas armie approched, which made the princes to leaue YAS, and to march toward COCHINA; but they could not doe it ſo ſecretly but the Tartarians were aduertiſed, who paſt ſpeedily thorow the citie, and charged them in the reer, in which incounter George Potoskie, nephew to him that was taken with Conſtantine, hauing fought valiantly, and ſlain many Tartarians with his own hand, was in the end ſhot thorow the bodie with an arrow, whereof hee died preſently. The Lord of Tiſcheuich came ſpeedily to the charge with a troupe of Coſſacks which he had ſtaied, and charged the Tartarians ſo furiouſly, as he ſlew 800 vpon the place, and put the reſt to rout.

Bicho generall of prince Alexanders armie forſakes him treacherouſly.

Alexander hauing receiued the letter aboue mentioned from prince Michna, he made anſwer, that (contrary to his promiſe to continue his friend and neuer to take armes againſt him) he had craued aid from the Turk to diſpoſſeſſe him of MOLDAVIA, to the which his predeceſſor had neuer pretended, neither could they according to the fundamental lawes of the country, and the conuentions accorded by the grand Seignior, when as the Moldauians ſubmitted themſelues vnder his ſoueraigntie, by the which no man could be Vayuod of MOLDAVIA vnleſſe he were borne in the country. Moreouer, he ſhould remember that it was in his power to diſpoſſeſſe him of VALACHIA, when as he entred BONZA with his armie in purſuit of Stephano, the which he would not do, nor detain any of his pretious moueables, which he had reſerued & ſent vnto him: that if he abuſed the power which he then had, God would not ſuffer ſo great an ingratitude & vſurpation to remaine vnpuniſhed. And although his armie were far inferior to his, yet he would let him know, that he neither feared him nor the Baſſa, putting his chiefe confidence in the aſſiſtance of the almightie, who had in many occaſions vſed them to abate the Turkes pride, which hee ſhould abhorre if he were a true Chriſtian, rather than to ioyne with them to ſatisfie his ambition.

Prince Alexanders anſwer to Prince Michna.

Prince Michna hauing ſent this letter to Skinder Baſſa generall of the Turkes armie, he was ſo incenſed, as he preſently commanded his lieutenant to purſue the Polonians with 12000 choice men, they being then at COTNARD, betwixt YAS and COCHINA. Prince Alexander being aduertiſed hereof, he ſuddenly cauſed his armie to aduance towards the fort of COCHINA. At the ſame time the Chancellor to prince Cherbanne who came with 150 horſe to prince Alexander, to aſſure him that his maſter was comming to his aid with fiue or ſix thouſand men, was purſued by the Turks neere vnto YAS, whereas he thought to haue found the ſaid prince, and of all his troupe only himſelfe and one more eſcaped, ſo as the prince could haue no certain news of the ſaid Cherbanne. Prince Coreskie who had remained with 2500 horſe not far from COTNARD, was alſo incountred by a great troupe of Turkes and Tartarians, which he could not wel diſcouer by reaſon of a little mountain that couered them: the prince ſeeing ſome of them appeare, charged them; but finding that as he defeated one troupe, a freſh ſucceeded in his place, he was forced to make his retrait, with this aduantage, that he had ſlain almoſt 6000 of his enemies, hauing not loſt aboue 250 of his owne men. But the prince was wounded with two arrowes, one in the thigh, and the other in the backe, which was a great diſaſter for himſelfe and for the whole armie. Hee which commaunded this troupe of Turkes being much amazed at this vnexpected incounter, hauing gathered his men together, and ioyned them to 15000 others whom the Baſſa had ſent, hee being yet at YAS, he cauſed this armie to approach within a quarter of a league to the Polonians, where hauing encouraged his men in what hee could, hee told them that to ſhew his affection vnto the Sultans ſeruice in this occaſion, he was reſolued to ſend a challenge to prince Coreskie, whom hee confeſt

A to be the moſt valiant of all the Polonian armie, ſo as he preſently diſpatched one of his captaines to goe vnto the prince, and to call him in the behalfe of his Generall. The captaine comming to Alexanders campe, demanded to ſpeak with prince Coreskie, who being brought vnto him, deliuered the charge he had from his Generall. The prince although he were neither able to ſtand nor to ſit on horſebacke, by reaſon of his wounds, yet would he needs haue accepted this challenge, if prince Alexander, and the chiefe noblemen of the armie had not coniured him to excuſe himſelfe by reaſon of his indiſpoſition: letting him know, that the euent of ſuch a combat did not onely import him, but all thoſe of his partie, who had their chiefe hope in him: whereunto the princeſſes added their inſtant intreaties, and among o-
B thers his deare ſpouſe, who was much afflicted for his wounds. The Lord of Tiſcheuich (a braue & valiant gentleman) being then preſent, intreated prince Alexander to giue him leaue to accept of the challenge for prince Coreskie his couſin, the which was willingly granted: ſo as he ſent a gentleman with the ſaid Turke, to know if the Generall would yeeld thereunto, which hee did willingly, not being ignorant of the qualitie and valour of the ſaid Tiſcheuich. It was agreed that the combate ſhould bee betwixt both armies, lying in a plaine open field, within a quarter of a league one of another, with promiſe, that neither partie ſhould bee aſſiſted.

A combat betwixt Tiſcheuich and the generall of the Turks armie.

Theſe two braue Warriours hauing taken leaue of their friendes, came to the place appointed, in view of both armies. The Turkes Generall being about fiftie paces from
C his armie, cauſed water to bee brought, with the which hee waſhed his mouth, eyes, noſe, eares, and priuie parts, beleeuing (according to his law) that this waſhing would ſerue as a purifying; then turning toward the Eaſt hee made his prayer: after which he went to horſbacke, being richly armed and furniſhed, and then marched ſoftly towards his aduerſarie, who attended him well mounted and armed; and ſo they began their combat, their chiefe armes being bowes and arrowes, which they ſpent without hurting one another, till at laſt Tiſcheuich hauing a Petronell, ſhot the Turke thorow the bodie and ouerthrew him, who ſtriuing to riſe againe, Tiſcheuich paſt ouer him with his horſe, and wounded him in the right arme, and at the next blowe ſlewe him: After which hee cut off his head, and carried it to prince Alexander.

The princes of Polonia enuironed by their enemies.

D The Polonians were verie ioyfull of the happie ſucceſſe of this famous combate, and the Turkes being much amazed, aduertiſed the Baſſa and Michna, that it was neceſſarie they ſhould bring the reſt of their armie and their cannon, if they would be reuenged of the Polonians. In the meane time the traytour Bicho, who had abandoned prince Alexander, with a troupe of two thouſand Tartarians and Moldauians, found meanes to get before the Polonian armie, and to cut off the way betwixt COTNARDE and the towne of BOTHOCAN ſixe leagues off. The Valachians and Tranſyluanians ledde by the Generall of Michnas armie, inueſted them vpon the right hand, and the bodie of the Turkes armie followed behinde: ſo as there remained nothing but vpon the left hand a wood of timber trees which might fauour their retrait. Skinder Baſſa hearing the ſuc-
E ceſſe of the combate, commaunded his armie to aduaunce preſently with ſixteene cannons. The princes ſeeing themſelues inuironed by ſo manie enemies, they reſolued to fortifie themſelues with their carts and carriages, and to defend themſelues: But what could fiue or ſixe thouſand men preuaile againſt two or three and twentie thouſand, for ſo many were thought to bee in the Turkes armie: True it is, they expected daily prince Cherbanne, and the lord Boſſi, who were within two dayes iourney, and brought with them tenne or twelue thouſand men. This made the Baſſa and Michna to aduaunce, to force the Polonians to yeeld, or to fight. Comming neere vnto their campe, and ſee-

ing them inueſted on all ſides but towardes the wood, they approached their cannon, which had beene able to haue ſpoyled their campe, but it was not their deſigne; they F onely deſired to take the Princes and Princeſſes priſoners, with the chiefe Noblemen: Whereuppon they ſent to ſummon the Polonian armie to deliuer into their handes the ſaid Princes and Lordes, promiſing that the reſt of the armie ſhould depart with bagge and baggage; whereunto they would not yeeld, but made an anſwere all with one conſent, That they would rather die than commit ſuch baſeneſſe and trecherie. This being reported to the Baſſa and prince Michna, they commaunded that ſome of their cannon ſhould bee G charged with ſmall bullets, and diſcharged through the Polonian armie; whereby there were a great number ſlaine and wounded. The princes who had but ſome ſmall pieces, made certaine vollies, but to ſmall purpoſe; neither had they any more bullets left and little powder maining in that encloſure, hee could not eſcape death, or at leaſt captiuitie, reſolued with fiue hundred horſe (the moſt valiant among the Polonians) to force through three or foure ſquadrons which were ſet in guard by the wood ſide, to the end none might eſcape, that place being moſt ſuſpected to the Turkes: the which they executed with ſuch furie, as they ouer- H threw all they incountred, ſhewing that it is a verie daungerous thing to make head againſt thoſe who are reduced to that extremitie, as they muſt either vanquiſh or die. Prince Coreſ-kie would not haue failed to haue made the like retrait, and to haue carried prince Alexander with him: but he could not ſit on horſebacke by reaſon of his wounds; and beſides hee had rather haue died than to leaue his wife in that extremitie. His laſt refuge was to diſguiſe him-ſelfe as well as he could, giuing it out that he had eſcaped with Tiſcheuich, to the end he might paſſe for a common ſouldior, if the priſoners were put to ranſome. In like manner the prin-ceſſes diſguiſed themſelues in the beſt manner they could for the like intent.

The Tukes cannon hauing ouerthrowne many of their carriages, which ſerued as a ram-pier, two ſquadrons, one of Tartarians, and the other of Turks, preſented themſelues at one I they yeelded, wherat their enemies were exceeding glad, deſiring nothing more than to take theſe noble princes priſoners, and to diſpoſe of the reſt at their pleaſures. The Turkes and Tartarians hauing entred their camp, making ſpoile of all, and ſeizing vpon what they could lay their hands on, beginning to ſhare their priſoners, the princes Alexander & Bougdan, with their mother were deliuered vnto Skinder Baſſa, who led them to CONSTANTINOPLE, whereas ſoone after their arriual they forſooke their God, denied their faith, and became renegadoes, for feare of perpetuall impriſonment, wherewith they were threatned. For which infidelitie Bougdan was preſently puniſhed; for hauing cauſed himſelfe to be circumciſed according to K

the law of Mahomet, he died, and the princeſſe his mother was confined to the old Seraglio.
As for prince Coreskie (in this generall ruine of a Chriſtian armie being forced to yeeld and ſubmit it ſelfe to the Turkes tyrannie) he had ſo diſguiſed himſelfe, as hee paſt for a time vnknown, and was led to YAS among the common ſouldiors, where he was afterward diſcoue-red by a ſouldior of his own partie, who obtained his libertie by this baſe trecherie. The Turkiſh captaine who had gotten this prince, hearing of his qualitie by the aforeſaid villaine, hee led him to Skinder Baſſa his generall, who recompenced him well, and made both him & the ſouldior who diſcouered him, to take ſolemne oathes not to impart it to any man: for he had an intent to draw ſome great ranſom from this prince, and to reſtore him to his former liberfine him into his priſons, by which meanes he ſhould make no vſe nor benefit by his taking:

But it hapned, that another perfidious of the Polonian armie aduertiſed Michna of Coreskies captiuitie, and in whoſe hands he was, who was ſo iealous, as he croſt & ouerthrew the good deſigne of Skinder Baſſa, telling him plainely in the preſence of many, that he knew for certaine prince Coreskie was among his ſlaues, and that he ſhould beware he did not eſcape, for that the graund Seignior would call him to account. The Generall made anſwere, That hee would be glad it were ſo, but he had not yet any notice of him, thanking Michna for his good aduice. But fearing that if he did what hee intended, ſuffering prince Coreskie to eſcape for a ranſome, the Sultan comming to the knowledge thereof, would be much incenſed, and puniſh him with diſgrace or death, the next day he told prince Michna plainely, that the aduice M that he had giuen him was true, and that Coreskie had bin found diſguiſed amongſt his other priſoners, whom he would preſent vnto his maſter, with the princes Alexander and Bougdan, as he did, of whoſe deliuerie you ſhall heare hereafter. The young princeſſe, wife to Coreſ-kie, hauing diſguiſed herſelfe, and disfigured her face with her nayles, and other helpes, fell into

A into the hands of a Tartarian captaine, with many others, who caried her into TARTARIA, whereas she was inhumanely intreated.

In the Mediterranean sea, Cosmo great Duke of TVSCANIE, continued his enterprises this yeare against the Turkes: his gallies part from LIGORNE, and runne into the Leuant, in quest of some occasions to annoy these infidels. They drew neere vnto CERIGO, in old time CITHAREA, the fiue and twentieth of Aprill, where meeting with certaine Christian ships, some Venetians aduertized them, that in the Island of CHIO, the Turkes had prepared two gallies to passe into BARBARIE. Inghirami (Admirall to the great Duke) resolued to set vpon them; being on the way, hee turned with his fleet where they were to passe, and B being couered by the night, he cast anchor vnder castle ROVX. But as hee attended a fauourable occasion, the Moone shining, discouered him to the Turkes, and the guards hauing aduertised the Turkes gallies, they presently began to flie, the one rowing amaine towards land, and the other continued her course at sea with all speed. Inghirami with his Admirall gallie got before that which was going to land, inuested it, being followed by the gallie called Saint Stephen, and three houres within night grapled with it, and laboured to enter it: but the Turkes (who were all good souldiours) defended it valiantly, so as they were aboue an houre fastened together, hewing one another furiously: yea, the Turkes (who were entred into Inghirami his gallie) fought valiantly vpon the hatches: But in the end the Florentines had the victorie, and tooke this gallie, yet with much losse of Christian blood.
C It was the Patron gallie of that famous Pirate Amurath Raise, which was commaunded by the sonne of Mammi a Portugall, called Mustapha Celebi, who was taken aliue, but sore wounded. The other gallie which had fled to sea and was the Captaine gallie of the said Amurath Rais, commanded by the Bey of MITILENE, nephew and sonne in law to that Pirate, called Amurath, who had married his daughter, being his brothers sonne, was inuested by the gallies of Saint Marie Magdalene, and the Patron S. Cosmo; the combate was no lesse furious than the other, the Turkes making a wonderfull defence: But after some houres fight, in which time the blood of either side was aboundantly spilt, the Florentines had the victorie: Amurath Bey of MITILENE was slaine, and Mustapha, whome these Turkish gallies carried to ALGIER in BARBARIE. They were of fiue and twentie bankes
D a piece, carrying lanthornes, and furnished with all things necessarie, and manned with foure hundred and twentie Ianizaries, all men of action, and practised in piracies with that pirate Amurath Rais. In this prize the Florentines tooke two hundred and fortie Turkes, and freed foure hundred and thirtie Christians: amongst the artillerie of these gallies, they recouered a cannon and two sacres of the gallie of S. Iohn, and a saile belonging to the great Dukes captaine gallie, which the Pirate Amurath Rais had formerly spoiled. These Turkish gallies were loaden with great store of rich commodities, the which was valued at two hundred thousand crownes. But this conqueste was gotten with the losse of much blood: for the Florentines had two hundred twentie three men wounded, and fiue and thirtie slaine in these two combats; the which made the Admirall Inghirami to rest satisfied in this voyage with the ta-
E king of two gallies, after which he returned to LIGORNE.

Wee haue formerly made mention in the Iesuites businesse, being presented at CONSTANTINOPLE, of the entrie which the Emperours Embassadour made into that citie. And this was the effect of his embassage. The peace concluded at SITVA TOROK, in the yeare 1606, betwixt the Emperour and the Sultan, was somewhat altered by the diuers interpretations and explications, which they made of the Articles therein contained. But this yeare 1616, in the moneth of March, the Embassadours of both their Imperiall maiesties assembled at VIENNA in AVSTRIA; that is to say, the Cardinall Forgatsi Archbishop of STRIGONIVM, and Chauncellour to the Emperour, the Cardinall Klessel, Bishop of VIENNA, the Baron of Rainek, Count Adolph Althen, the Earle of Solmes, the Earle of Thoron, F and Pauli Apponi Nagi, for the Emperour: Hali Bassa of BVDA, Achmat Tybata, and Gaspar Gratsiani, for the Turke, where they concluded these following Articles; to take away all pretext of controuersie in the explication of those which were agreed vpon at SITVA TOROK. But it was after that Embassadors had been sent of either side, as well to CONSTANTINOPLE, as to PRAGE, with royall and rich presents.

Deputies meet at Vienna, to confirme the peace betwixt the Emperor & the Turke.

Articles extracted out of the Letters Patents of ACHMAT, Emperour of the Turkes.

Articles touching the differences of the peace.

1 For as much as many things haue happened of either side contrarie to the peace concluded at SITVA TOROK, it hath beene necessarie to confirme it anew, and to reduce it into the right course. Wherefore this holy peace made and concluded at SITVA TOROK, shall be obserued for twentie yeares compleat, to begin at the date of these presents. Giuen in the moneth of Chomazzilahil, in the yeare of the prophet 1024.

2 That the peace heretofore concluded at SITVA TOROK, shall remaine firme in all the Articles, according to the Treatie which the Emperour Rodulphus did send vnto vs, signed with his hand, and sealed with his seale, the which wee haue receiued willingly, and the same Treatie wee also sent backe confirmed backe to the Emperour of the Romans, the which he receiued in like manner. And this treatie which was sent vnto vs bare date the ninth of December, in the yeare 1606 of Iesus of reuerend and happie memorie: And that which we sent vnto the Emperour of Romanes, wherewith he was satisfied, was dated in the yeare of the prophet 1021.

3 Since the time that AGRIA, CANISE, ALBA REGALIS, PESTH, BVDA, ZOLNOK, HATVVAN, and other places haue bin taken, that the villages which were of their appurtenances, shall hereafter remaine annexed vnto them. But those villages which since the peace of SITVA TOROK, haue beene hindred from paying of their tribute by either side, or haue been held by force, contrarie to the treatie of peace, that those villages shall bee viewed by Commissaries appointed by vs and the Emperour of the Romanes, and presently shall bee set at libertie, and restored to their lords and right owners. As for the villages which pay tribute to either part, those which are situate vpon the frontiers of the Emperour of the Romans, towards NOVIGRADE and other places, shall be viewed by Commissaries thereunto deputed, who shall take a Register, to the end those villages may not be molested by our neighbors, in like manner the Commissarie shall make a Register of the villages which pay to both sides, lying neere the townes of the Emperour of Romanes, of STRIGONIVM and other places, to the end they may take notice what villages are bound to the one or the other partie, that hereafter there might grow no controuersie. And for that which concerned the 158 villages about STRIGONIVM, for the which there was some controuersie, the 60 lying neerest to the said towne shall be adiudged, as it hath been agreed, and the Commissaries of either side shall take order for it. The foresaid villages lying neere to STRIGONIVM, and all others of the realme of HVNGARIE, which shalbe adiudged to the one or other partie, shall not in any sort be disquieted, more then of ancient custome, and there shalbe nothing exacted from them more than the tribute.

The Iudges of villages shall pay vnto the Lord the tributes according to the antient custome; If the Iudges do not bring the tribute, the Bassa or Beg of the place shall summon the inhabitants thrice, to the end their Iudges may come and pay the tribute, and if they doe it not after these summonings, hee shall write vnto the next gouernour for the Romane Emperour, that the Iudges of the villages may be sent vnto him with the tribute: And finally, if after all these formalities it be not paid, the Bassa or Beg may vse force to fetch in these inhabitants, and make them slaues: The which shall be obserued throughout all the villages which owe vs tribute in the realme of HVNGARIE, yet nothing shall bee exacted or demanded of them, more than they haue been accustomed to pay in antient times. The Commissaries deputed shall view and set downe by a ioynt consent the limits and bounds of the lands and Seigniories, which are held by either part in the vpper or lower HVNGARIE, and in the realmes of CROATIA, and SCLAVONIA.

4 They that shall breake the peace of either part, if they cannot be conuicted and punished instantly; we haue decreed, that there shall be order taken of either side, and iustice shall be done within three moneths. All prisoners of warre, and others which haue been taken since the peace of SITVA TOROK, shall be set at libertie without ransome.

5 Achmet Tyhaia hath presented vnto vs a Roule of places built and fortified since the peace, for the retrait of souldiors. Whereupon we haue ordained, that informations should be taken of all fortifications made on either side since the peace of SITVA TOROK; and if it be found that any fortification hath been made contrary to the peace, it shall bee visited within foure moneths by the Captaines on both sides, or by a Nobleman of either partie, and the fortifications which shall bee found to haue beene thus made contrary to the peace, shall be demolished.

6 And

A 6 And for that some wicked and malicious spirits, haue attempted many things vniustly to infringe this holy peace and good amitie, we haue ordained, that if hereafter any persons of either side shal attempt or practise any thing that is wicked and lewd, contrarie to the peace and mutuall coresponden-cie, we will aduertise the Emperour of the Romans thereof, and in like manner the Romane Emperor, king of HVNGARIE and BOHEMIA, shall write vnto vs to our court, and no credit shall be giuen to the reports of such persons.

7 The Priestes, religious men, and Iesuites, among the people of holy Iesus, which follow the Popes religion, may build Temples in our realmes there to say diuine seruice after their manner, and read the Gospell. Wee will yeeld them all fauour, and will not suffer any one to disturbe them contrarie to law
B and equitie,

8 It shall be lawfull for the inhabitants borne in the realme of HVNGARIE of either part, to re-edifie the villages ruined and laid waste, and after they are inhabited, they shall pay tribute to the one and the other, if they be such villages as haue been accustomed to pay to both.

9 Merchants shall haue free leaue to traffique, passing from our port into those countries, and the transport of merchandise shall be free to such as shall take letters from the Gouernours of the frontires, or from the Receiuors of the thirties; the which they shall represent in passing, and the Lord of the place or the Receiuor shall attest the said letters by his manuall signe or seale; for the which they shall not take any thing of the merchant. If the merchant be to passe by any dangerous place, they
C shall giue him a sufficient conuoy to conduct him in safetie: and after that the merchant hath paied of either side the thirtith which is the full due, no man shall molest him nor hinder him to go where he pleaseth.

10 The merchants which would passe from the realmes and seigniories of the emperour of the Romanes and the house of AVSTRIA into our kingdomes with merchandise or money, shall come vnder the ensigne of the Emperour of Romanes, and shall haue his letters pattents to vs, without the which they shall not be suffered to passe. And if they enter without ensigne or the said patents, the Agents and Consuls of the Roman Emperour may seize vpon their vessels, merchandise, and money, and shall giue aduice thereof vnto their Emperour: Wherefore all the merchants of the Emperours Countries, of the house of AVSTRIA, and of the king of SPAINE, both aswell those of the Low Countries,
D as his other Realmes, may come with all assurance into our realmes, with their ships, money, and merchandize paying three in the hundred. And as for the Agents and Consuls of the Romane Emperour, they shall pay vnto them two Aspers for the hundred: And in doing so the said Agents and Counsuls of the Roman Emperour shall haue a care of the merchants affaires. If any merchant chance to die, the Emperours Agent and Consull shall cause his goods to be sealed vp, and shall take them into their possession, to the which our Treasuror shall haue no colour of pretension. And when as the merchants haue paied the custome of three for the hundred in one place, they shall not be bound to pay it in another for the same merchandize. If the merchants haue any controuersie among themselues or with others, the Cadi or Iudge of that place may take knowledge of the cause, if it exceed not the value of 4000 aspers, but it shall be iudged by the Cadi of our Port.

E 11 As long as this holie peace shall continue, the posts which shall be sent with letters by the Bassaes, Begues, Lords, and Agents, or by the Visiers, on our behalfe to the Emperour of the Romanes; and respectiuely from him to our Court, shall be honourably entertained by our officers: And if the way be dangerous, they shall giue them assistance to conduct them into a place of safetie with their letters. And if the Agent which is with vs, desire to write any particular letter vnto the Emperour, and not send an expresse messenger, that this letter shall be carried by the post, and deliuered safely where it is directed. That the messengers of the Bassaes and Begues shal go no more into the villages, but the Iudges shall bring the tribute and deliuer it where they ought.

An accord for the execution of the Articles touching the villages in controuersie, and the razing of fortifications.

F To conclude all differences touching the deuision of villages, and demolition of fortifications made in preiudice of the peace of SILVA TOROK: Wee the Commissaries deputed, had agreed vpon the time of foure moneths: But for that all controuersies cannot be decided within that time, by a common consent wee haue concluded the time of twelue moneths, for the expedition of all that shall remaine vndecivndecided; all things remaining in the same estate during the time. For the ending of these affaires, on the behalfe of the maiestie of the Romane Emperor, shall be sent the noble lord Adolph of Aithen Earle of the sacred Empire, with others according to his maiesties good pleasure. And on the behalfe of the Otoman emperour hath beene named the Noble Lord Ali Visier Bassa. G

For the greater assurance of these things, wee the said commissioners haue caused six copies of this treatie to be dispatched, in the Italian, Hungarian, and Turkish tongues. And we the director or president of the priuie Councell, to his Imperiall maiestie and Cardinall, with other Counsellors of his priuie councell, and Commissioners, hauing full power and authoritie, haue confirmed these presents vnder our hands and the seales of our Armes.

As also we Ali Bassa of Buda, Visier to the most powerfull Sultan Achmat. Tyhaia Mutafaraga, and Gaspar Gratiani embassadors to the Turkish Emperour, with the Imperiall Maiestie of the Roman Emperour, hauing full power and authoritie to conclude this treatie, haue signed it with our hands, and sealed it with our ordinarie seales; whereof there were three copies deliuered to either partie. Giuen at Vienna the first of March 1616. H

This new declaration of the Ottoman Emperor, vpon the first Articles concluded at Sitvatorok, shewes plainely how much the Turkes are of late daies refined from their ancient barbarisme and rudenesse, hauing made themselues capable of great affaires. And these frequent meetings betwixt the emperour of the Romanes, and the Sultan, by their embassadors, as a holie watring of the oliue tree of peace, seemes to make it so flourishing, as the sweet sauour may pierce further and make vs hope that God will make vse of this peacefull vnion, to prepare vnto himselfe some meanes to a new harueſt, or a healthfull conquest of soules wandring amidst the falshoods of the Alchoran. I

Prince Coreskie his wife carried into Tartaria.

Alexandrina wife to prince Coreskie hauing beene taken at that vnfortunate ouerthrowe of the Polonian princes in Moldavia, by Skinder Bassa and prince Michna; she was carried away (as you haue formerly heard) by a Tartarian Captaine, and led captiue vnknowne to Bialigrot, where she receiued many indignities, being with child; yea during the time of her lying in, which was fiue or six moneths after her taking: all which time shee bethought herselfe of a meanes to hasten her owne deliuerie, and withall to free a Polonian souldiour called Iaques, who had carried armes vnder prince Coreskie. This man although he knew the princesse well, and might by her discouerie haue purchased his owne libertie; yet he would not do it: Wherefore the princesse hauing tried his fidelitie, taught him a meanes how to worke his owne libertie, and hers in the end, by his care and diligence. The Tartarian being one day absent from his lodging, Alexandrina tooke occasion to talke with Iaques the Polonian, telling him, That hauing found him faithfull vnto her, she would direct him a course, whereby he might redeeme himselfe from captiuitie; so as he would principally obserue what she did prescribe. Iaques hauing promised to execute whatsoeuer this ladie should enioine him, yea with the hazard of his life, she then said vnto him: You know the Tartarian whose captiues we are, hath an elder brother, a verie rich man, who of late is become blind and deafe, by reason of a great cattarch and defluction which is fallen downe into his eyes and eares, wherwith his brother seemes to be much afflicted: I haue a iewell which my great lord and husband gaue me when we were made sure, the which I haue kept carefully, hiding it sometimes in my haire, sometimes in my old ratterd rags which I haue worn since my captiuitie, the which I haue much esteemed; for that my deare spouse had assured mee, that the stone which was set in this iewell, had many and singular vertues, & amongst others, that it would restore the sight, which had been lost by defluction, and cure deafenesse, so as it were not naturall or too inueterate. I am resolued to take out the stone, and deliuer it thee: after thou hast sounded the Tartarian, whether he will set thee at libertie if thou dost cure his brother of his infirmities; making him sweare solemnly not to retaine the stone, but to suffer thee to carrie it away, to the end thou mayest restore it vnto me without his knowledge. Hauing resolued vpon this plot, the ladie said vnto him, you must also demaund of the sicke man a horse and some money with passe-ports to goe into your countrie, to the end thou maiest go speedily to my deare husband, whereseuer thou shalt heare of him, and to deliuer him my letters, and bring me an answere if it be possible. The Polonian hauing sworne to K L M

A performe whatsoeuer the ladie commaunded him being at libertie; the princesse deliuered him the stone, he swearing to restore it vnto her againe, as soone as he had done his cure, if it were not taken from him by violence.

The Polonian attended with impatiencie vntill the Tartarian did talke vnto him of his brothers infirmitie; who finding him one day much afflicted, tooke occasion to tell him, that he knew a certaine meanes how to cure his brother, without any paine, or taking any thing inwardly: I beleeue nothing, replyed the Tartarian, for all the physitians in the countrie could not do it; but if he could effect his saying, he promised to set him at libertie without ransome, and to giue him wherewithall to conduct him into his countrie: it is the recom-
B pence said the prisoner I meant to demand, and that you sweare vnto me by your great god not to faile of your promise when I haue performed mine, and not to retaine, nor suffer any one to take from me the thing I shall vse in the cure. The Tartarian hauing solemnly sworn, and laid his right hand vpon his heart, the Polonian tooke a time to make preparation for his cure. The Tartarian although he distrusted his new physition, yet he acquainted his brother with the proiect, who being desirous to recouer his sences, intreated his brother not to neglect the offer, promising to saue him harmelesse, both in regard of the ransome which he expected from the Polonian, and for the mony he should giue him. The day appointed being come, the Tartarian prest the prisoner to performe his promise; to whom the sicke man also promised a horse and fiftie chequines to returne into his countrie, taking the same
C oath which his brother had formerly done. All things being readie, he applyed his physicall stone binding it fast to one of his eyes for the space of seuen houres, after which being taken away he saw clearely, and in like manner he recouered his other eye, and afterwards his hearing by the like application: whereat the Tartarians much reioiced; giuing vnto the Polonian what they had promised, and procuring him passe-ports from the gouernor, without which he could hardly get out of the countrie.

The Polonian before his departure told the Tartarian captaine that hee had a suit vnto him, that was, that the Polonian woman which was also his prisoner was his neere kinswoman, intreating him that in respect of his good office he had done to his brother, he would vse her and her little infant better, and that as soone as hee were returned into his countrie, Iaques seekes out Coreskie.
D he would take a course for her ransome, and it might be would bring it himselfe. The Polonian hauing acquainted the ladie with what had past, and deliuered her iewell faithfully vnto her, hauing receiued her letters to prince Coreskie, and vowed to find him out, he tooke his leaue. This Polonian trauelling towards his countrie, met with one of the same nation, who hauing beene taken prisoner with prince Alexander, made an escape: these two discoursing freely of their aduentures, Iaques inquired carefully what was become of the princes which had been carried prisoners to CONSTANTINOPLE by Skinder Bassa, and especially of Coreskie; and hearing that he was in the prisons of the Blacke Sea, he inquired by what meanes he might speake with this prince, or at least how he might conuey some letters vnto him: to whom he answered that it was verie difficult, for that he was straightly guarded. But hee
E vnderstood that the French embassador had sometimes leaue to send to visit him, whereof he might informe himselfe more particularly. After this, Iaques intreated his countrieman to deliuer certaine letters which the princesse had written vnto her kinsfolkes, the which hee promised to performe faithfully, and so they parted. Iaques comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, he grew acquainted with one of the French embassadors men, who was sometimes imployed to visit the prince, and to carrie him mony and other necessaries, by whose meanes he got accesse vnto the prince, and deliuered his letters, the which he receiued with much ioy hearing of his wiues health. Eight daies after the Polonian comming to visit the prince, he receiued from him an answere to his wife, and so tooke his leaue; who after many troublesome incounters, returned to BIALIGROT, where finding the ladie all alone (the Tartarian He returnes into Tartaria.
F and his seruants being gone a hunting) he gaue an account vnto her of his negotiation, and deliuered his letters, whereat she was much ioyed, hearing that he was aliue, though infinitly grieued for his captiuitie, vnderstanding that the Grand Seignior had refused to put him to ransome. After their discourse, the princes aduertised her faithfull Agent, that since his departure, the Tartar had growne iealous of her qualitie, and had enquired of her what her husband, husband, her kinsfolkes and their estates were; to whom she had answered that her husband was a captaine who had beene taken prisoner with prince Alexander, and carried with him into Turkie; and as for her other kinsfolkes they were all souldiors, which had beene ruined during the troubles of MOLDAVIA, desiring the Polonian to remember it well, least they should be found to differ when they should come to treat of her ransome. The Tartarian returning soone after to his house, he found Iaques the Polonian there, whom he entertained very kindly, both in reward of the good offices he had done to his brother, and for the hope he had of his prisoners ransome, remembring that Iaques had told him that she was his kinswoman, and that it might be he would bring it. After some little discourse, Iaques asked him what ransome he would require for his Polonian prisoner, to whom the Tartarian answered, That he would haue 6000 chequines for her and her sonne, vnlesse he would giue him the stone with the which he had cured his brother: to whom the Polonian replyed, that as for the stone it was not in his power, hauing restored it to a nobleman whom he had followed when he was taken prisoner. And as for the ransome which he demannded for his prisoner and her child, it was more than she and all her kinred were worth, she being wife to a captaine who had beene taken prisoner at the defeat of Alexander, and for want of meanes was still detained. The Tartarian interrupted him, saying, That he vnderstood she was of noble extraction, and that she had rich kinsfolkes, who would not suffer her to spend her life in captiuitie. I confesse said the Polonian, that she is issued from noble parents, but they are ruined during the troubles of MOLDAVIA; adding withall, that he would not haue returned if he had thought he would haue demaunded aboue 1000 chequines, the which he offered him, intreating him to accept it, in regard she was his kinswoman, and for the good office he had done for his brother. You haue beene satisfied replyed the Tartarian, and haue no cause to complaine: Notwithstanding after some contesting, by the mediation of the captaines brother who had beene so well cured, the ladies ransome was set at three thousand chequines, whereof her faithfull agent gaue present intelligence to prince Charles brother to prince Coreskie, who sent this summe with all possible speed; and so the princesse and her little infant were redeemed from captiuitie, and conducted into POLONIA by their faithfull solicitor: From whence she aduertised the prince by letters of her deliuerie. This relation was written by a French man, who by his report was present in all the troules of MOLDAVIA: but as touching her deliuerie by meanes of the cure I cannot warrant it, but leaue it to the censure of Physitians and Naturalists, who can best iudge of the vertues of stones, hearbes, and plants; but it is certaine that shee was imprisoned and ransomed as an vnknowne person.

Prince Coreskie his wife redeemed from the Tartarians.

1617 In the yere 1617, there came to PARIS a Chiaus, a Spanish Renegado, called Solyman, sent from CONSTANTINOPLE with letters from the emperor Achmat to the king, for the deliuerie of eight and twentie slaues, who had redeemed their libertie for money in diuers ports of ITALIE, and in their returne to CONSTANTINOPLE, had beene taken by the ships of MARCEILLES. The king caused them to be set at libertie. But the Chiaus had also charge to intreat his maiestie to cause iustice to bee done vnto the Moores Grannadines, expelled out of SPAINE, and wronged in their goods and persons, vpon their passage into FRANCE; wherein he had what contentment he could expect of iustice. Notwithstanding he did witnesse openly his amazement at their long delaies, in the dispatch of suits, saying plainely, That FRANCE which had the reputation throughout the world, to maintaine euery mans right inuiolably, did no iustice, but after long and tedious pursuits; and that the execution of decrees, was many times longer than the suit it selfe. Whereas the Turkes iustice (said he) was speedily administred to euery man; and within eight daies they saw an end of the greatest and most important suits. This Chiaus was fauourably entertained, and defraied with his traine for the space of six or seuen moneths at the kings charge.

A Chiaus sent from Constantinople to Paris.

The cause of his voyage.

The estate of the Turkes empire this yeare.

As the Turkes estate hath not growne great but by combustions, so it is ordinarily full of troubles; whereby it seemes that the preseruation thereof depends in making warre vpon others, or to support it when as neighbour princes seeke to recouer that which they had vniustly wrested from them, by the Ottoman force. So this great estate entertained this yeare foure great armies, two at land, the one against the Persians his auncient enemy, the other

A (conſiſting in a manner all of Tartarians) againſt the king of POLAND, as ſupporting the part of the Vayuod of MOLDAVIA againſt the Turke, who had ſetled another in that prouince: And two nauall armies, the one in the blacke ſea againſt the Coſſackes or Ruſſians; who made daily incurſions into the Ottomans countrie, men wholly giuen to armes, which go to ſea in ſmal boats, able to carrie but fiue or ſix men, made of the bodies of hollow trees; but they are in a manner inuincible with theſe kind of boats: for when as the diſaduantage of a combat forces them to ſound a retrait, they retire neere vnto the land, and in ſuch places whereas the Turkiſh gallies cannot approach; and ſo they eaſily preuent a totall ouerthrow. Finally in caſe of neceſſitie, they carrie their veſſels with them. For in the end of B the laſt yeare finding the paſſage of the blacke ſea ſtopt at the mouth of the riuer of Danow by the Turkiſh gallies, they put their boats into carts, and taking the way by the mountains they brought them eaſily into the ſea. The Turkes fourth armie is in the white ſea, as they call it, employed either to conduct the Carauan, which brings the tribute from EGYPT to CONSTANTINOPLE, or in ſearch of the gallies of MALTA, and FLORENCE, which ſcoure thoſe ſeas continually to annoy the Turke. The armie againſt the Perſian is led by Haly Baſſa, ſucceſſour to Mehemet Baſſa, he who fled into PERSIA after that he had loſt 60000 men in a ſet battell: After which being ſent for to come to CONSTANTINOPLE, fearing that the Sultan would take reuenge of ſo great a loſſe vpon his life, he retired to the Sophie, where he now remaines.

He entertaine fiue armies.

C The Turks being much annoyed both at ſea and land by the Vſcoques, made great complaint to the eſtate of VENICE, with whom they are in league, being greatly grieued at their theſts; and complaining much that they could not paſſe by ſea without danger of ſeruitude or death: adding withall that theſe pyrats hauing gotten a way into Turkie by the Venetians territories, they were by them made ſlaues and ſlaine in their owne countries; and although they went not from their houſes, nor vndertooke any voyages, yet they were ſtill in alarme, and ſubiect vnto ruine. That the ſmall reſiſtance which was made, gaue great cauſe of icaloſie, that there was ſome ſecret intelligence betwixt the ſubiects of the Seigniorie of VENICE and the Vſcoques, and that they diuided the ſpoile betwixt them. Finally that in what ſort ſoeuer the matter paſt, they held them inſupportable to all men, but eſpecially to themſelues.
D The Turkes threatned to take their iuſt reuenge, the which being impoſſible to effect in the countrie of the Vſcoques: for that by the letters of the commonwealth of VENICE their paſſage was ſtopt, they reſolued to be reuenged vpon their ſubiects, and recouer a part of their goods which they had loſt. Finally, they prepared to come into the gulph of VENICE with a mightie armie, the which without doubt had brought that State into great extremities, and beene verie preiudiciall to many prouinces of Chriſtendome. But for that the inſolencies and theſts of the Vſcoques had like to haue ingaged the Venetians in a dangerous war againſt the Turke with whom they were in league, it ſhall neither be vnpleaſant nor vnprofitable to make a little digreſſion, and ſhew what theſe Vſcoques were. About the yere 1550,
E there aſſembled together in certaine pleines neere the ſea belonging to the princes of the houſe of AVSTRIA, people (who were cruell, violent, and infamous) from diuers parts of the countrie of CHIMERA, DALMATIA, and the other confines of HVNGARIE, and ſuch as had beene baniſhed from the ſtate of VENICE, whoſe delight was onely to liue vpon ſpoile and blood. All theſe theeues being thus gathered together (whom they called by a generall name Vſcoques) as enemies to all art and induſtrie to liue honeſtly by their labours, retired themſelues into a deſart countrie, receiuing no pay from the princes of AVSTRIA who commaunds there. Being thus by their naturall inclination giuen to ſpoile, adding thereunto the ſpurre of pouertie, nothing moued them to ſtay in thoſe places, but all libertie was left them to rob and ſpoile: whereupon they applyed all their minds and forces; ſo as hauing made certaine light foiſts, they began to make courſes at ſea, with the moſt barbarous and F impious crueltie that euer was practiſed among the Sithians, Tartarians, or any other inhumane nation whatſoeuer. And for that it is an ordinarie courſe for any one that will commit a great villanie, to ſeeke out ſome goodly pretext to couer it; ſo they concluded among themſelues, to ſhadow their inſolencies and theſts with a colour to go againſt the Infidels. Wherefore in the beginning, there were no merchants were they Turkes, Iewes, or ſubiects to the Turke, although they were Christians, but if they entred into the gulph either to traffique or to furnish VENICE with prouision and merchandize, they were taken by them, their goods diuided amongst them, and they forced to pay a great ransome or to die miserably. All the ports of the state of VENICE, both of ISTRIA, DALMATIA, and the Islands from whence they receiued their victuals and prouision were soone after shut vp by these pirats, who not content to spoile the Turkes (which trafficked no more by reason of their great dangers and losse) allured by the rich spoiles which they tooke, and the desire they had to increase them, they began to set vpon the Venetian ships, forcing the merchants whom they tooke to confesse by torments, that the goods belonged to Turkes, although in effect their chiefe bootie came from Christians. Hauing drawne many vnto them of their owne humours, and thinking their spoiles at sea not sufficient to satisfie their couetous desires, nor the presents which they were to giue to others, to bee fauoured and supported in the courts of princes, they staied not long before they entred with all violence into the Turkes countrie, through the Venetian territorie, to whome they were as hurtfull as to the Turkes; from whence they carried away rich spoiles and many prisoners. There was nothing that was pretious, rich, or good, but was subiect to the insatiable greedines of those pittilesse theeues and pirats, if passing by sea they came neere vnto the maritine coasts. Whereupon grew the great complaint you haue heard made by the Turkes, threatening to be reuenged vpon the estate of VENICE for the insolencie of the Vscoques, which afterward bred a cruell warre, betwixt that State and the Archduke Ferdinand of Grets now Emperour, who seemed to support them, thereby to engage the State in a war with the Turke. But for that the successe thereof doth not belong to our historie, we will leaue it to them that haue written it at large.

They spoile the Turkes country and the Venetians.

Death of Achmat.

On the fifteenth of Nouember this yeare Sultan Athmat Chan hauing liued 30 yeres, and gouerned that great empire of Turkie fifteene, died. When he came to the empire hee was but 15 yeares old; he was of a good constitution, well complexioned, and somewhat inclined to bee fat, strong and actiue, which appeared by his exercise in casting of a horsemans mace of nine or ten pounds weight, wherein he exceeded any one of his court; in memorie whereof there are two pillars set vp in one of the courts of the Seraglio at CONSTANTINOPLE with an inscription, as markes of his dexteritie. He was by nature ambitious and proud, which some hold qualities befitting his great estate. He was not so cruell as many of his predecessors: But he was much giuen to sensualitie and pleasure; for the which he entertained 3000 concubines and virgins in a Seraglio; being the faireſt daughters of the Christians. His mother was a Christian of BOSNA, or of CIPRES, and therefore it is thought he was somewhat fauourable to Christians. He was much delighted in hawking and hunting; and namely for hawking he kept in GRECIA and NATOLIA 40000 faulkoners, who attended his comming, and kept his hawkes in their seuerall places of charge, and had good yearely pensions. Neither were his huntsmen much fewer in number, or of lesse charge. As the Turkish emperours are bound by the law of their religion once euerie day to practise some manuall trade, so Mahomet his father gaue himselfe to the making of arrowes, and Achmat to the fashioning of horne rings, such as the Turkes weare when they draw their bowes. This they do in the morning, after they are readie and haue said their prayers, then they call for their exercise, but it is onely for forme, for they scarce make an arrow or a ring in a whole yeare.

Nought but Affliction, thundring out of Heauen, makes men of earth to any Goodneſſe giuen:
Nor longer than ſhe thunders, any feare that any Heauen holds any Thunderer:
So Muſtapha; (while Heauen reſtrain'd his ſtate, and held him fettered in his brothers hate)
To vertuous actions did his ſtudies driue, was courteous, pious, and contemplatiue:
But when his brother could no longer liue, and Libertie did to him Power giue:
Then Pride, and Tyrannie his horſes were,

THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, NINTH EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES.

Sman the eldeſt ſonne of Achmat, being not aboue twelue yeares old, Muſtapha brother to Achmat being fiue and twentie was drawne out of a cell where he liued as it were religiouſly and in contemplation, and proclaimed Sultan Muſtapha Chan. They write of him that he grew cruell, cauſing young Oſman to bee kept vnder ſure guards, putting to death his brethren: He alſo did many indignities vnto the Chriſtian embaſſadors; and to confirme him in his Throne hee gaue great ſummes of mony to the Ianizaries and Spahis, and ſent a meſſenger to VIENNA to the emperor, to aſſure him that he would maintain inuiolably whatſoeuer had beene concluded betwixt him and his deceaſed brother Achmat. But growing odious by reaſon of his tyrannie, the graund Viſier came out of PERSIA with an armie and depoſed him, forcing him to returne to his cell, ſetting prince Oſman at libertie, and ſeating him in the imperiall throne. But for that it may ſeeme ſtrange that Muſtapha ſhould be preſerued aliue, during the raigne of his brother Achmat, (contrarie to the cuſtome of the Ottoman Emperours, who do vſually kill all their brethren at their firſt comming to the crowne, thinking thereby the better to aſſure their eſtates) it ſhal be fit to make mention thereof. Mahomet the third of that name, dying in the yeare 1602, and leauing Achmat and Muſtapha his ſonnes by the Sultana Filatra a ladie of CIPRES, ſome ſay of BOSNA, Achmat the eldeſt was ſent for ſpeedily out of MAGNESIA by the Baſſaes, to take poſſeſſion of his fathers crowne, being the firſt emperor of that name. And for that the cuſtome of the Turkiſh emperors was (as we haue ſaid) to haue neither brother nor nephew aliue, vnleſſe they could ſaue themſelues by flight; yet the Viſier, Baſſaes, and other officers of the court concluded in counſell, that it was not fit that Muſtapha brother to Achmat ſhould die, grounding their opinion vpon a good reaſon of State; for that their emperour being but fifteene yeares old, they feared (that dying in his nonage, without children able to gouerne) the empire might fall into combuſtion and ruine it ſelfe by reaſon of ciuile warres. Whereupon they decreed that Muſtaphaes life ſhould bee preſerued, but with that caution and reſtriction, that he ſhould remaine ſtill a priſoner in ſome chambers of the emperors Seraglio at CONSTANTINOPLE.

Muſtapha aduanced to the Empire.

Depoſed againe.

During Achmats minoritie, and before he had children, there was no cruell decree made againſt Muſtapha, but hee onely continued in his contemplation without any libertie: But when as the emperor ſaw himſelfe fortified with iſſue, and remembring the cruell cuſtome of his predeceſſors, he many times propounded the putting of his brother to death to his Councell; the which may ſeeme verie ſtrange it tooke not effect, hauing beene often concluded

ded. Among others, it is written that his death was concluded one euening, and that it ſhould G haue beene put in execution the next day: But Achmat was ſo frighted in the night with appariſions and fearefull dreames, as day being come, he ſaid, Seeing that the onely reſolution to put his brother to death had ſo terrified him, he did belieue that his torments would much increaſe if he ſhould put it in execution; and therefore he commaunded his brother ſhould liue, more in regard of the terrour of his mind, than for any brotherly affection. Another time Sultan Achmat being in one of the windowes of his Seraglio, he beheld his brother Mu- ſtapha, who by his permiſſion was walking in the gardens with his guard: Some one of his Baſſaes or other officers that was neere vnto him, and willing to flatter his humour, told him that it was a matter of dangerous conſequence to ſuffer him to haue ſo great libertie. Ach- H mat (moued with iealouſie and diſtruſt) grew into rage at his wordes, whereupon he ſuddenly tooke his bow and arrow (being a verie expert archer, as all the Turkiſh nation generally are) and aimed at his brother to kill him, but at that verie inſtant he felt ſo great a paine in his arme and ſhoulder as not able to let looſe his arrow, nor to performe what he had intended, he ſaid with a loud voice, That Mahomet would not haue Muſtapha to die. This prince had three chambers in the Seraglio, where he remained a priſoner fifteene yeares, and ſpent his time in a contemplatiue kind of life, after the manner of the Muſulmans; his whole delight was to read the Arabian bookes of their doctors in diuers ſciences. The Grand Seignior gaue him leaue ſometimes to take the aire of his gardens with his guard, and called him to conſult with him of affaires of eſtate, taking his aduice many times, knowing him to be of I a ſound iudgement.

After a long impriſonment, and a dayly apprehenſion of death, the emperor Achmat falling grieuouſly ſicke in Nouember as you haue heard, his Baſſaes and other Councellors about him (ſeeing the danger he was in) perſuaded him to take ſome good courſe for the ſuc-ceſſion of his empire. He had children by the Sultana, but they ſo young as they were not capable to gouern the empire. Moreouer this Sultana was dead, and the children left friendles, and none to ſpeake for them. But on the other ſide the Sultana Flatra mother to the emperor Muſtapha was yet liuing, who thought that if the Baſſaes ſhould vndertake to gouerne the State during the minoritie of the emperours children, her honour would be much eclipſed:
wherefore ſhe fauoured Muſtapha, & perſuaded the dying emperor to make him his ſucceſſor. K
On the 15 of Nouember Achmat ſeeing his end grow neere, he called for his brother, and told him that ſeeing death approched, he deſired to prouide for the preſeruation of the empire, and therfore had made choice of him to ſucceed him, intreating him to take the gouernment vpon him preſently after his death. Muſtapha was much amaſed at his ſpeech, and anſwered him with words full of feare and humilitie, that he might not accept of the honour which he did him, ſeeing that the empire did rightly belong vnto his eldeſt ſonne. Achmat diſabled his ſonne for ſo great a gouernment, both for his age and capacitie; being neceſſarie for the maintenance of ſo great a monarchie, that he (who was of ripe yeares and deepe iudge-ment) ſhould take vpon him the mannaging thereof; recommending the children hee had by the Sultana vnto him, intreating him to vſe them in the ſame manner that hee had vſed L him; leauing the other children which he had by concubines being his ſlaues to his diſcretion. Soone after theſe words, Achmat dyed, and Muſtapha was generally acknowledged for ſucceſſour to the Turkiſh empire, who at the firſt was ſo amazed as he thought he had beene in a dreame, to ſee himſelfe aduanced to ſo great a power and ſoueraigntie, from a ſtraight priſon and a daily apprehenſion of death. At his firſt comming to the empire he cauſed the Perſian embaſſadour to be ſet at libertie, whom his brother Achmat had cauſed to be reſtrai-ned, contrarie to the publique faith; for that newes came vnto the court of ſome combuſti-ons raiſed by the Perſian. After which he ſent ſpeedily to the Baſſa of BVDA in HVNGA-RIE, commaunding him to entertaine the treatie of peace made by his predeceſſor with the emperour inuiolably. Yet notwithſtanding he carried himſelfe during the ſmall time of his M raigne inſolently and cruelly; for violating the lawes of nations, he had ill intreated the baron of Mole or Sancie embaſſador to the moſt Chriſtian king, ſetting guards vpon him as a priſoner, hauing cauſed his people to be put in priſon, and tortured after their manner. The reaſon of this indignitie which Muſtapha did vnto the French embaſſador, and to his people,

A grew vpon an occaſion which will require an ample diſcourſe; for the better vnderſtanding of that which hath gone before. After the ouerthrow and taking of the princes of MOLDAVIA, prince Coreskie as you haue heard was brought by Skinder Baſſa to CONSTANTINOPLE, whereat the Grand Seignior was wonderfully well pleaſed, for that he was held (euen by his enemies) for one of the moſt valiant and redoubted princes of Chriſtendome, wherefore he was ſent away priſoner, and confined to the towers of the black ſea, the which are fiue miles diſtant from CONSTANTINOPLE, a place appointed for the guard of priſoners of great qualitie and importance, ſuch as he was. He was ſhut vp with a French Captaine called Rigaut, in a little chamber which was on the top of one of thoſe towers, in which chamber
B there was a window capable for a man to paſſe through, and yet it had no barres, for that the height of the place freed it from all ſuſpition. This prince was much ſolicited by the Turke to become a Renegado, as the princes Alexander and Bougdan his brothers in law had done, but he reſiſted it with a generous reſolution, reſoluing rather to die in that tedious captiuitie, than to commit ſo baſe an act againſt God and his conſcience: The which being made knowne vnto the king of POLONIA, it moued him to compaſſion, and made him write to the French embaſſadour, and to intreat him to be a meanes that this prince might be put to ranſome, and freed from captiuitie, at what price ſoeuer; the which the embaſſador durſt not vndertake, although he deſired it much, for that he had no charge from the king his maſter. The Emperours embaſſadour did what poſſibly hee could, knowing how much the C libertie of this prince might bee auaileable to Chriſtendome: For which conſiderations, the Turke would not yeeld in any ſort to ſuffer him to be releaſed; ſo as the friends of this captiue prince were out of hope euer to ſee him at libertie. But moſt commonly in ſuch extremities the Almightie workes by the ſecret inſtruments of his diuine prouidence, and giues aſſiſtance vnto them that feare him, when as all humane helpe and hope failes, as you may vnderſtand in the ſequell of this hiſtorie, whence grew the embaſſadors affront which he receiued.

The generous reſolution of Prince Coreskie

About the ſame time, there had beene a Ladie taken out of PODOLIA with a faire young daughter of hers and a maide ſeruant, by the Tartarians, who ſold them vnto a Turke, and he brought them vnto CONSTANTINOPLE to make his profit. This Ladie
D who was a Chriſtian, hearing nothing from her husband for the ſpace of nine moneths, went accompanied with her daughter to the French Embaſſadours houſe which was at PERA, to craue his aide and aſſiſtance; where his Secretarie (who was called Martine) moued with compaſſion and loue promiſed vnto them all ſeruice, and afterwards aſſured the mother, that if ſhe would promiſe he ſhould marrie her daughter, he would endeauour to redeeme them from captiuitie, whereunto the Ladies yeelded, and they paſt their promiſe in writing to the Secretarie, whereupon he payed two thouſand and fiue hundred crownes for their ranſome, and ſent them home into their countrie. Being returned, the ladie made her husband and the reſt of her friends acquainted how they had been freed from captiuitie, and of the contract of marriage which was paſt betweene her daughter and the French
E embaſſadours Secretarie; but the father did altogether diſlike of this marriage, for that Martine he ſaid was no gentleman, and had not an eſtate to entertaine his daughter according to her qualitie. The mother aduertiſed Martine ſoone after of the fathers refuſall, proteſting vnto him that he alone was the hinderance: And as for the money which hee had diſburſed for their ranſome, they would ſend it vnto him if he pleaſed to CONSTANTINOPLE with intereſt. Martine was much diſcontented, and diuers letters and expoſtulations paſt betwixt them, but he could not obtaine the execution of his deſire, and their promiſe; whereupon hee grew full of griefe and melancholie, and thereupon went to viſite prince Coreskie who was in the Blacke Tower, to make his complaint vnto him, and to take his aduice what courſe were beſt for him to follow: He made his excuſe that hee had F beene ſent by his maſter to carrie the prince ſome money, as he had done at other times, who making the prince acquainted with his diſcontent, (for that he knew theſe Podolians, and had formerly allowed of the ſuit which hee had made to this virgin,) he comforted him ſaying, That if he might by any meanes get out of priſon, he would willingly ſupplie the defects which they obiected againſt him, and would maintaine him againſt all that ſhould

haue beene put in execution the next day: But Achmat was ſo frighted in the night with apariſions and fearefull dreames, as day being come, he ſaid, Seeing that the onely reſolution to put his brother to death had ſo terrified him, he did belieue that his torments would much increaſe if he ſhould put it in execution; and therefore he commaunded his brother ſhould liue, more in regard of the terrour of his mind, than for any brotherly affection. A grew vpon an occasion which will require an ample discourse; for the better vnderstanding of that which hath gone before. After the ouerthrow and taking of the princes of MOLDAVIA, prince Coreskie as you haue heard was brought by Skinder Bassa to CONSTANTINOPLE, whereat the Grand Seignior was wonderfully well pleased, for that he was held (euen by his enemies) for one of the most valiant and redoubted princes of Christendome, wherefore he was sent away prisoner, and confined to the towers of the black sea, the which are fiue miles distant from CONSTANTINOPLE, a place appointed for the guard of prisoners of great qualitie and importance, such as he was. This prince was much solicited by the Turke to become a Renegado, as the princes Alexander and Bougdan his brothers in law had done, but he resisted it with a generous resolution, resoluing rather to die in that tedious captiuitie, than to commit so base an act against God and his conscience: The which being made knowne vnto the king of POLONIA, it moued him to compassion, and made him write to the French embassadour, and to intreat him to be a meanes that this prince might be put to ransome, and freed from captiuitie, at what price soeuer; the which the embassador durst not vndertake, although he desired it much, for that he had no charge from the king his master. The Emperours embassadour did what possibly hee could, knowing how much the C libertie of this prince might bee auaileable to Christendome: For which considerations, the Turke would not yeeld in any sort to suffer him to be released; so as the friends of this captiue prince were out of hope euer to see him at libertie. But most commonly in such extremities the Almightie workes by the secret instruments of his diuine prouidence, and giues assistance vnto them that feare him, when as all humane helpe and hope failes, as you may vnderstand in the sequell of this historie, whence grew the embassadors affront which he receiued.

About the same time, there had beene a Ladie taken out of PODOLIA with a faire young daughter of hers and a maide seruant, by the Tartarians, who sold them vnto a Turke, and he brought them vnto CONSTANTINOPLE to make his profit. This Ladie
D who was a Christian, hearing nothing from her husband for the space of nine moneths, went accompanied with her daughter to the French Embassadours house which was at PERA, to craue his aide and assistance; where his Secretarie (who was called Martine) moued with compassion and loue promised vnto them all seruice, and afterwards assured the mother, that if she would promise he should marrie her daughter, he would endeauour to redeeme them from captiuitie, whereunto the Ladies yeelded, and they past their promise in writing to the Secretarie, whereupon he payed two thousand and fiue hundred crownes for their ransome, and sent them home into their countrie. Being returned, the ladie made her husband and the rest of her friends acquainted how they had been freed from captiuitie, and of the contract of marriage which was past betweene her daughter and the French
E embassadours Secretarie; but the father did altogether dislike of this marriage, for that Martine he said was no gentleman, and had not an estate to entertaine his daughter according to her qualitie. The mother aduertised Martine soone after of the fathers refusall, protesting vnto him that he alone was the hinderance: And as for the money which hee had disbursed for their ransome, they would send it vnto him if he pleased to CONSTANTINOPLE with interest. Martine was much discontented, and diuers letters and expostulations past betwixt them, but he could not obtaine the execution of his desire, and their promise; whereupon hee grew full of griefe and melanchollie, and thereupon went to visite prince Coreskie who was in the Blacke Tower, to make his complaint vnto him, and to take his aduice what course were best for him to follow: He made his excuse that hee had F beene sent by his master to carrie the prince some money, as he had done at other times, who making the prince acquainted with his discontent, (for that he knew these Podolians, and had formerly allowed of the suit which hee had made to this virgin,) he comforted him saying, That if he might by any meanes get out of prison, he would willingly supplie the defects which they obiected against him, and would maintaine him against all that should oppose themselues against the accomplishing of his desires. This made Martine studie by G what meanes he might free the prince, to the end he might bind him to succour him when he was at libertie, and loue which is many times the author of many goodly inuentions, suggested one vnto him which was verie subtile and difficult to execute: which was to send vnto prince Coreskie a bottome of packethred in a little pie, which he sent him with other meat, aduertising him by letter that vpon a certaine night concluded betwixt them, he should put downe the packethred at his chamber window, whereunto a ladder of cords should be tied, by the which he might descend from the tower: The which was afterwards punctually effected, not by Martine himselfe, but by a Greeke priest, who liued in CONSTANTINO-PLE, to whom he had imparted his enterprise, and had ingaged him vpon hope of great re- H ward from the prince. In the mean time Martine doubting that he should be suspected to practise this escape, resolued to be gone, and tooke leaue of the embassadour, whom hee gaue to vnderstand that he had some speciall vrgent affaires which did presse his speedie returne into FRANCE; and therefore hee left the execution of his dessigne to the Greeke priest, who failed not at the time appointed to do as the Secretarie had directed him. The prince hauing drawne vp this ladder of roapes with the helpe of his packethred, and being come to the foot of the tower, with his chamber fellow, he found the Greeke priest attending for them, who told him that he had charge from Martine to conduct them to a certain caue, which was in a great rocke a league from thence, where they must remaine all the day, and that in the euening hee would not faile to come vnto them, and bring them ha- I bits like vnto his owne, that being so disguised, hee might conduct them to his lodging in CONSTANTINOPLE, and there conceale them as long as they should thinke fit. This de-uice pleased them well, and so they went all three vnto the said caue, whereas the two Cameradoes hid themselues, and the priest returned to his house.

At the breake of day, it being the three and twentieth of Nouember 1617, some of the guards entring the prisoners chamber, saw that they were escaped, and found the ladder of roapes which they had vsed, tied to the window, whereat they were much amased, knowing wel that they should smart for it: Notwithstanding he who had charge of the prisons, sent speedily to CONSTANTINOPLE, to giue notice of their escapes. As soone as this was knowne, they sent posts speedily to all parts, to make inquirie of these fugitiues, especially at the ports K and passages, giuing them speciall charge to obserue all men that past, if there were not one who had the little finger of his right hand shrunke vp as prince Coreskie had by a wound which hee had receiued. Within few daies after the Turke seased vpon the seruants of the Baron of Sancie or Mole, embassador for the French, torturing two of them after their manner; which is to lay the partie vpon a table on his bellie, and to giue him three or foure hundred blowes with a staffe vpon the soles of their feet, the calues of their legges, and their but-tockes, yet could they not make them say any thing that might charge their master, as these Turkish tormentors did hope. Not content herewith, they did as much to a poore Turke, who was a weauer by his trade, and dwelt neere vnto the embassadour, thinking to force him by this cruell torture to depose falsely, that he had seene the Secretarie Martine going L and comming to his masters lodging, vntill the time of the prisoners escape; but God would not suffer the weauer to depose any thing but the trueth, notwithstanding all the miserable and cruell torments which hee had suffered. The which is worthie the obseruation, for that the Turkes doe generally hate Christians mortally, and do greatly reioice at their disasters. As for the guardes of the Towers, some of them were impaled, and some were pounded or beaten to pieces in great mortars of yron, wherein they do vsually pound their rice to reduce it to meale.

A his iuſt grieuances, he could not obtaine leaue but by giuing two thouſand crowns vnto his Iaylor: True it is, that this preſent made the Chiaus tell the Embaſſadour, that if he would obtaine any fauour from the Muphti, he muſt procure it by money, according to which aduice he gaue three or foure thouſand crownes, whereupon the Muphti became tractable, acquainting the graund Seigniour Muſtapha with the Embaſſadours iuſt complaints, and of what importance his detention was, ſeeing there was nothing found to charge him that hee had fauoured the eſcape of prince Coreskie, as it was ſuſpected; and that his Secretarie who had practiſed it for his owne priuate profit, had left his maſter aboue tenne or twelue dayes before the ſaid eſcape, with an intent as he ſaid to returne into FRANCE: Finally, that all
B the world would taxe him to haue violated the law of nations, and that no Chriſtian prince nor other would hereafter put any confidence in him, and it was to be feared that they would all ioyne together, and make warre againſt him: And in truth the Embaſſadors, both the king of ENGLANDS and the Low Countries, were much diſcontented at this vnworthie vſage of the French, proteſting openly, that if he were not ſpeedily ſet at libertie, they would retire themſelues into their countries. All which conſiderations repreſented by the Muphti, mooued the graund Seigniour to commaund that the ſaid Baron of Mole or Sancie ſhould The embaſſador ſet at libertie.
bee ſent backe to his houſe without any further diſpleaſure. But all this could not free his houſhold ſeruants from their impriſonment, but he was forced to pay two or three and twentie thouſand crownes for their redemption; for elſe they ſhould haue been ſo tormented, as
C their liues had been in danger, for ſo they were threatned. Soone after the graund Viſier, hearing of the tyrannous gouernment of Sultan Muſtapha, returned from PERSIA with his whole armie towards CONSTANTINOPLE, where he forced him to leaue the empire, and to retire to his Cell, hauing raigned but two months and ſome odde daies.

But to returne to prince Coreskie, whom we left with captaine Rigaut in the lodging of the Greeke prieſt at CONSTANTINOPLE, whereas they lay hidden for the ſpace of two moneths, vntill that their good hoſt got leaue from the Patriarke of ALEXANDRIA, as well for himſelfe, as for two others (who he ſaid wer of his ſocietie) to goe and confine themſelues in the deſarts of the Archepelagus with many Hermits, which liued there after the manner of Prince Coreskie eſcapes from Conſtantinople.
D the antient Anchorites. Hauing gotten this leaue and paſſe-port, they imbarqued being diſguiſed like prieſts, and arriued at ETCHVT, where they found an Engliſh ſhip readie to ſet ſaile for MESSINA in SICILIE, from whence he went by land to NAPLES, where hee made himſelfe knowen to the king of POLANDS Embaſſadour, who was wonderfull glad of his libertie, leading him to the Duke of OSSVNA, then Viceroy of NAPLES, who furniſhed him with all things neceſſarie, and a good conuoy to goe to ROME, where the Pope receiued ſingular content to ſee him, and to heare of his ſtrange aduentures. From thence hee paſt to VIENNA, where the Emperour entertained him according to his merits. After which he retired to his owne houſe, full of honour, gotten by his valour and conſtancie in his afflictions. Our Embaſſador that was late in CONSTANTINOPLE ſaith, he eſcaped by the blacke
E ſea, and ſo into POLONIA.

OSMAN

Osman, thy gentle Nature farre declinde from Turkiſh tyrannie and pride of minde, Which made heauen raiſe thee and extirpat them,
the proud vſurpers of thy diadem.
O! would all princes (when their States are bleſt with Power, and Empire) thinke their intereſt In thoſe their bleſſings, held but by the grace of Gratitude, and Goodneſſe; and no place Is held without them long: They ſoone would trie, that Truth preuailes paſt all their Policie.

THE

OSMAN THE FIRST OF that name, tenth Emperor of the Turks, he that now ſwaieth that mightie Empire.

PRince Oſman being ſet at libertie by thegraund Viſier, he cauſed him to be proclaimed Sultan, and ſeated in the Imperiall throne of the Ottomans, with the general applauſe of all the Baſſaes and armie. The French Embaſſadour being by the ſame meanes freed from his guard, aduertiſed the king his maſter, how barbarouſly he had been intreated by Muſtapha, intreating his maieſtie to reuoke him from that charge. Wherupon the king ſent two gentlemen to CONSTANTINOPLE to the new Emperour Oſman, to demaund reparation of the indignitie done vnto his Embaſſadour and Secretarie; and to let him vnderſtand, that he could not ſend any other Embaſſadour to his Court to condole the death of Sultan Achmat his father, nor congratulate his comming to the Eaſt, vntill that he had receiued ſatisfaction from him befitting his dignitie, and the wrongs he had receiued in his Embaſſadour. The graund Viſier and the Muphti hearing this embaſſie, and conſidering of the actions which had paſt, aduiſed the Emperour Oſman to ſend an Embaſſadour to the moſt Chriſtian king, to confirme their league, and to teſtifie both by word and letters how much he was diſpleaſed for his diſcontent. 1618

The French king ſends to Conſtantinople.

The Grand Seignior by the aduice of his Viſier and others, ſent Vri Chiaus into FRANCE to confirme the Articles of peace betwixt the French and the Turkes. At his firſt audience he preſented a letter vnto his maieſtie with this ſuperſcription.

The Turk ſends an Embaſſador into France.

To the moſt glorious and puiſſant prince of the beliefe of Ieſus, arbitrator of all the differences which happen among the Chriſtian nations, and of all the moſt noble, and the moſt ancient, the Emperour of FRANCE, to whom we wiſh the end of his dayes to be happie, and his deſires accompliſhed.

Know, that I ſend vnto you the capitulations and treaties of peace which are betwixt our maieſties: giuing you to vnderſtand that there is not any thing firme or ſtable in this world, neither king nor beggar, although they liue long: That which pleaſeth God cannot faile. If all mens deſires ſhould ſucceed, without doubt all men would goe to heauen. Man whatſoeuer hee doth, or in what dignitie ſoeuer hee bee, ſhall not remaine in this fraile life; wiſe men know it, and it is apparant to the learned. By that which we haue ſaid, we deſire to let you know, that hee who was in health, hath incountred death, and is gone to a goodlier place, to Paradiſe, my father Sultan Achmat Chan; the God which hath no reſemblance haue mercie on him. No man ſhall remaine in this lying world: And in Paradiſe are the approches to God, where there is no death. Finally he is gone.

His letter to the French king.

Since the beginning of the Ottomans vntill this preſent, the empire of my fathers & their countries from

from father and sonne, from hand to hand, and from father to sonne, the inheritance comming so vnto vs; our vnkle Sultan Mustapha Chan, for that hee was elder than our selfe, was preferred before vs to the throne of the Ottomans, and was some daies in peaceable possession of the empire, yeelding iustice equally to all men both great and small. But as he was shut vp many yeares in secret places, praying vnto God continually: so of himselfe hee hath relinquished the dignitie of the Emperour, and contemned it. The empire then belonging to those of our high linage, and for that by right it should come vnto me, the almightie God by his infinite bountie and mercie hath restored it into my hands, my Visiers, Bassaes, Lieutenants, the Muphti, and other great personages, and they that are in any respect with mee: and finally, all my subiects and vassals, by a generall consent haue acknowledged me for Emperour, in the happie yeare 1027. About the first day of the moone of Ianuarie, in a good houre. Wherefore I am seated in the great throne of the Ottomans, like vnto that of Salomon, a powerfull and able Emperour, and in all our countries and cities: All the Musulmans being assembled together in their churches to preach, the greatnesse of my name hath been proclaimed, and through all the mints of mine empire they haue grauen it in their stampes, to coyne peeces of gold and siluer. Finally, whersoeuer there are any Musulmans, and in what places there are men, my name shines like gold. Heereafter iniustice nor impietie shall haue no place, but iustice shall be done equally. Now we are in ioy, and for that our naturall disposition is good, and the ancient friendship betwixt vs is perfect, I therfore thought good to aduertise you of all that hath passed here, & to send you our letters of Imperiall alliance by Vreiu Chiaus, who is my ancient seruant, hauing had the managing of my treasure, whereof hee hath giuen mee good account, being arriued at your court, carrying my said letter, hee deserues to be receiued with honour: swearing and protesting againe vnto you, to obserue in all points the full capitulation made betwixt my predecessors, and your great grandfathers, and for our part you may bee assured, that the faith promised shalbe maintained as it hath been heretofore by our predecessors. And from the day I entred into my throne, I haue made my will knowne to all my Viceroyes, and other officers which doe my iustice, and generally to all those of my obedience, intreating you to giue the like commandement to your gouernours of prouinces, and other officers of iustice, as in like maner to all your subiects. And as your grandfathers haue taken the faith of our high family, so it may please you to continue with me, and we desire that on both sides it may be good and firme. Know then that for my part it shalbe obserued, so as of your side there be nothing done contrarie to the promised faith. And if before we came vnto the Imperiall throne, your Embassador which did your affaires hath receiued any distaste, and hath not receiued the honour and friendship accustomed, in my time he shall be the more honoured and respected as the chiefest Embassadors haue been: I haue commaunded that he shalbe greatly fauoured, and our respect shall be vnto him as Quineo, that is to say, Gold; and doubt nothing of it: For I doe certifie you.

The French king hauing receiued by this action as a full satisfaction for indignitie done vnto his Embassador: soone after he called the Baron of Mole or Sancie home into France, sending the Earle of Sezi to succeed him as Embassador at Constantinople.

A battell betwixt the Turks & the Persians.

The warre continuing still betwixt the Turkes and the Persians, the graund Visier was sent to inuade Persia with a great armie, where after many exploites of warre, newes came to Constantinople, that the Visier had gotten a great aduauntage vpon the Sophie of Persia in a battell which had been fought, wherein there had been 100000 men slaine. And although the Turks lost the greatest number, yet they remained masters of the field, and spoiled the Persians campe, who was retired or fled. For that the maner of the Sophie is to fight with the Turks in retiring or giuing way a little; and with this manner of fighting they haue alwaies made head against the Turkes. After this ouerthrow the Visier aduanced with his armie, and entred farre into Persia, which made many doubt that his returne would proone difficult: yet soone after there came letters to Constantinople, importing that the Turkes being in Persia in great distresse for victuals, the Sophie had sent an Embassadour to the Visier to demaund peace, promising hereafter to satisfie the tribute of silkes which he ought yearely vnto the Turke; And that the Visier (in regard of the necessitie of his armie) had accepted his offer, and graunted him peace, the which Sultan Osman did afterwards ratifie. After the conclusion whereof, the Sophie sent many cammels loaden with victuals vnto the Turks armie, which was in great distresse and want.

A commet seen ouer Constantinople.

During the Turks warre in Persia, vpon the anniuersarie day of Sultan Achmat, there appeared in the night a Commet ouer the citie of Constantinople, in forme like vnto a crooked

A crooked sword, or Turks cimiter: and it was so great, as it extended from the meridian neere vnto our zenith, vnto the horizon: the point began to shew it selfe an houre after midnight, and then it appeared little and somewhat whitish; and gaue but a glimpse, after an howre it was more apparant and of a deeper coulor, and the more it did rise, the redder it was and like vnto blood; but at the breake of day it vanished by little and little in the light: And it was so big when the point approched neere vnto the zenith, as the hilt was hidden vnder the horizon; the Mathematicians did obserue, that it followed the motions of the heauens; It did alwaies rise in one place, and the bending of the said sword was toward CRATES, more Southerly than it. It did appeare directly in the East a quarter towards the South, the point com-
B ming directly towards CONSTANTINOPLE; and the blade extending it selfe to the said East a quarter to the South, which is iustly the part where PERSIA is situated. The edge looked directly towards CONSTANTINOPLE, the which made men discourse diuersly, and many were amazed, fearing that it did signifie the losse and defeat of their armie in PERSIA, whose returne they feared much.

Vri or Husseine Chiaus hauing finished his embassie in FRANCE, came into ENGLAND with the like charge, and had audience from his Maiestie at WHITEHALL, Sir Thomas Glouer being Interpreter, from whom I receiued a true discourse of his whole speech as followeth.

The Interpretation verbatim is thus.

Most happie Emperour, as I haue with my owne hands, bowing my selfe to the dust of your princely feet appresented vnto your excellent maiestie the most mightie and high Sultan Ottoman my Lord and Master his Imperiall Letter, so likewise I most humbly beseech your Maiestie, that you will bee pleased in conformitie thereof, to vouchsafe your princely answere by your noble Letter, and to deliuer the same into the hands of me your slaue: and be euer partaker of all blessednesse and happinesse.

A Copie of the Letter of Sultan Osman the present Ottoman Emperor, written to the Kings Maiestie, and presented by Husseine Chiaus. I

Although in this transitorie world, if the king or the beggar should enioy the longest terme of life that might be, and obtain all that his heart could wish: yet it is most certaine, that in the end he must depart and be transported to the world eternall; and it is well knowne vnto the wise, that it is impossible for man to abide for euer in this world. The occasion of this prologue is, that the immortall, omnipotent, and onely God hath by his diuine will and pleasure called vnto himselfe our father of blessed memorie Sultan Achmat Chan, who in life was happie, and in death laudable; and departing out of this momentarie world to be neere the mercifull Creatour, being changed into perfect glorie, and eternall blisse, hath his habitation on high, and his rest in Paradise. This paternall empire and monarchicall K kingdome hath almost vntill this present blessed time, beene alwaies hereditarie, from grandfather to father, from father to sonne, and so cursiuely in that manner; but hauing regard vnto the age and yeares of our great and noble vnkle Sultan Mustapha, he was preferred and honored to sit on the Ottoman throne, and being setled for some time, tooke care for the affaires of the Empire, and for all that might concerne the people both in generall and particular. But he hauing been manie yeares retired in solitarinesse, and giuen to deuotion and diuine obedience, being also as it were wearied with the cares of the empire, of his owne accord withdrew himselfe from the gouernment; for that the diademe and scepter of the empire of the seuen Climats, was the true right and inheritance of our most excellent Maiestie, of the which (with the meeting and consent of all the Visiers, and other deputies of State, of the Primat of the Mussulman law, and of the other honourable Doctors, of the Souldiors, and of all subiects both publike and priuat) the almightie God hath made an high Present and worthy guift vnto vs. And in the happie day in the beinning of the moone Rebea-il-euel of this present yeare 1027, in an expected time, and in an acceptable houre, was our blessed and happie sitting established vpon the most fortunate Ottoman throne, the seat and wisdome of Salomon. In the pulpits of all the Mosques (the congregations of the faithfull and deuotion of the Mussulmen) throughout all our dominions is read to our Imperiall name the * Hutbeh. And in the mints (where innumerable summes of mony are coined, as well vpon the siluer as the gold) our happie name and stampe is signed. And our most powerfull commandements are obeyed in all the parts and dominions of the world: And the brightnesse of the light of the Sunne of Iustice and equitie, hath caused the darkenesse of iniuries and molestations to vanish away. M

* Hutbeh, is a prayer only for the prosperitie of the king.

Now seeing it hath been an ancient custom of our famous Predecessors to giue notice of the same vnto such Princes as are in sincere friendship, and doe continue it with the House of great Maiestie and our Imperiall Court: Wee also haue written these our princely letters, and appointed for their Bearer the choice among his equals Husseine Chiaus (whose power is great) one of the honoured and respected seruants,

A seruants of our magnificent Port, the refuge of the world, to the end that such newes might cause great ioy of our most honourable assumption. And wee doe hope that when they shall come to your hands (in conformitie of the well grounded friendship vpon the sure league, articles, and writings, which hath bin established of old with our most royall Race, and permanent Empire) you will manifest infinite ioy and gladnesse, and certifie as much to the rulers and gouernours of the dominions and countries vnder you, that they may know that the articles of peace and league, and the points of the oath which are firme and
B to be desired on both parts, from the time of our graundfather and predecessors of royall stocke now in paradise (whose soules God enlighten) vndoubtedly during the time of our raigne shall bee obserued with all respect. And let there not bee the least imagination of any want of due obseruance of the signes of friendship on our part, or by any manner of meanes on your part, for the violating the foundation of the peace and league.

The Copie of a Letter written by Halil Bassa, chiefe Visier, and Generall in the expedition against the Persian, at his returne from the warres to the citie of SENIT in Aprill 1618, vnto Sir Paul Pinder Knight, then Embassadour for the Kings Maiestie at CONSTANTINOPLE.

The humble Visier Halil Bassa.

C To the courteous Lord of the nation of the Messiah, both great and honorable among the people of Iesus, & the true determiner of Christian affaires; our good friend Paul Pinder, the English embassador whose later daies be with all felicitie. To whose noble presence (after our many kind salutations tending to all good affection and manifestation of ioy, worthy and beseeming our friendship) our louing aduice is this, That if you desire to heare of our state and being, you shal vnderstand, that after we departed from the happie port with the armie for the wars of ASIA, we arriued and wintered in MESOPOTAMIA, and remouing thence in the Spring with all the Mussulman host (alwaies victorious) wee went to VAN, from which place vntill we came to TAVRIS, the Mussulman armie went on alwaies sacking and
D destroying all those places and townes of the Persians which wee met withall by the way in those parts, where were burnt, pillaged and ruined some thousands of villages, and tormenting all those people that came to hand. And when we were come neere to TAVRIS, the generall of the Persian forces (of peruerse religion) called Carelghai Han (the accursed) retired himselfe into the said TAVRIS, where beating vp his drummes in euery quarter, he made a shew that he had a will to fight, so wee sent a little before vs some Tartars and others of our armie to hearken out and take notice of the enemie, who meeting with 7 or 8 hundred Persians of note, put them to the sword, very few escaping, & that with very great difficultie and hazard. By which the said generall finding himselfe vnable to resist the power and fury of the Mussulman host, or to stay any longer in the said place, the very same day that we arriued there, the said generall hauing spoiled all the citie, fled away; so wee tooke the place, ransacked it, and
E burned all the buildings, towers, gardens, and whatsoeuer else we found within it: And thus the great citie TAVRIS by diuine fauour and grace became ours. Then forthwith we sent after the enemy, the Tartar with some Beglerbegs, who ouertaking them, gaue them battell; and albeit some of ours did fall, yet they which fell on the enemies side were innumerable. And so going forward towards ERDEVIL (their obscure residence) about ten daies iourney of country, we went burning and spoiling it, and killing all the Persians that we met; that indeed there was so much glory & honor wonne, as that all the antient men of the country doe affirme, there was neuer seene the like; insomuch, that from the confines vnto ERDEVIL, 20 daies iourney of countrie was on that maner by vs destroied. Thus afterward the king caused to emptie the said place of ERDEVIL, and fled into a place called HVLCHAL, and caused his armie to go to the top of a high mountaine, from whence hauing sent 3 or 4 times men of qualitie vnto vs seeking and entreating for peace, with promise to giue yearely to our Emperor 100 Somes of silke, and all such places as are vpon the confines gotten in the time of Sultan Solyman, except DER NE and DER
F TINK; Wherewith we were contented with the peace, and his Embassadour is vpon the way comming toward vs. And so we returning the same way againe (alwaies spoiling) we came to ERZIRVM. And this our present Letter is written vnto you for the respect and preseruation of our friendship: and euen as our amitie hath euer bin hitherto sincere and firme, so likewise by the grace of God at our arriuall in the happie Port, it shall be in like manner maintained and continued, that more cannot possibly be. And so God keepe you in health.

The wars growing hot in BOHEMIA against the Protestants, and the emperor raising what G 1619 forces he could to suppresse them, the directors or gouernors of the country wrote their letters to Bethlem Gabor prince of TRANSYLVANIA, to acquaint him with the estate of their affaires. To whom he made answere, That his countrie standing euen in the very iawes of the Turks, whose counsels were neuer quiet, but euer working like to the waues of the vast ocean, and alwaies watchfull to imbrace all occasions vpon any discord of the Christians, especially now when they had pacified all quarrels with the Persian, & had no rebels in ASIA, against whom they might imploy their forces; he had propounded to himselfe to attend the consent and fauor of the Ottoman Emperor, wherby he might take from him all occasion to make any irruption into the neigbor countries, and haue the better meanes to imploy his best means to H reconcile the discords among the Christians; wherefore hauing sent vnto CONSTANTINOPLE to acquaint the Graund Seigniour with his intent, and to craue his fauour, he receiued letters from thence of the 17 of August, whereby hee was assured of the graund Seigniors consent and fauour: whereupon he resolued (notwithstanding the opposition of the house of AVSTRIA, the Pope of ROME, and others of that faction) to take armes in defence of the Bohemians, promising to be in September following vpon the confines of MORAVIA, vnlesse hee found some stay in HVNGARIE. Being aduertised of the state of BOHEMIA and MORAVIA, he leuied an armie at CLAVSENBVRG, and entred into the vpper HVNGARIE, whereas most of the Barons submitted themselues vnto him, onely Humanoie a great man in that countrey opposed himselfe: but not able to make his partie good, he fled into POLONIA. After which he sent his I armie (being 18000 strong) and took FILEK, TERNAV, VACCI, NOVIGRADE and others; after which he seised vpon NEVHEVSAL, the gouernour being deliuered bound vnto him. The Palatine of HVNGARIE wrote letters to Redei generall of the prince of TRANSYLVANIAS armie, wishing him to consider what the forces of the kings of SPAINE and FRANCE were, with the house of AVSTRIA and their allies, and that the electors of the empire (some excepted) would send aid vnto the Emperor; who answered, that he doubted not of the power of those kings, and that the Electors would send supplies vnto the Emperour; yet he hoped that before they came, all should be ended, and their dinners should be prouided.

Soone after the prince of TRANSYLVANIA came to PRESBVRG with his armie, a town of note in HVNGARIE, whereas their kings are vsually crowned. The newes thereof comming to VIENNA, they sent 3000 soldiors with three pieces of ordnance down the riuer of Danow, who K entred the suburbs on the 13 of October, the night was very stormie & rainie, and the Transyluanians taking this opportunitie charged them, and slew the greatest part, their commander flying away with some few. The suburbs being taken, Bethlem Gabor sent to the Palatine, to know whether he would yeeld the town and castle without force, giuing him some time to resolue; who after consultation with some noblemen, they resolued to yeeld, and so the town was deliuered into his hands. After which he sent part of his armie vnder good commanders into AVSTRIA, to the gates of VIENNA, where they committed great spoile, the particular relation whereof I leaue to the historie of the Emperors liues, to which it doth properly belong.

Propositions made by the Transyluanians and Hungarians to the Bohemians

In Nouember Bethlem Gabor prince of TRANSYLVANIA and the Estates of HVNGARIE sent L
Embassadors to PRAGE, where they propounded diuers articles vnto the Councell, & among others, that they should ioyntly send embassadors to the grand Seignior, and that the prince of TRANSYLVANIA should negotiat the businesse. And for that the kingdom of HVNGARIE was much exhausted, whatsoeuer should be taken in STIRIA, CARINTHIA, and CARNIOLA should bee vnited vnto it, to the end it might be the better able to resist the Turke, all which tended to the preiudice and ruine of the house of AVSTRIA. The prince of TRANSYLVANIA hauing taken diuers townes in HVNGARIE, belonging to the Emperour as king of HVNGARIE, and entred AVSTRIA in hostile manner in fauour of the Bohemians; knowing that he had thereby much incensed the Emperour, and the whole house of AVSTRIA, and that if he should preuaile ouer the Bohemians, the whole burthen of the warre would lie vpon him, he therfore in the end of M this yeare sent an Embassador with presents to CONSTANTINOPLE, to craue assurance of the graund Seigniors ayd and support (vpon whose fauour he had alwaies depended) in case the Emperour should inuade TRANSYLVANIA, where being countenanced by many of the chiefe Bassaes, he had assurance of Sultan Osmans support and protection, the which he confirmed by a solemne oath vnder his hand, as followeth.

The Great Turkes Oath to Bethlem Gabor, Prince of TRANSYLVANIA.

Sultan Osman,

By the grace of God vnconquerable Turkish Emperour, sweares by the Highest, Almightiest, and Almightie Gods holinesse, by his kingdome, by the substance of the heauens, the Sunne, the Moone and the Starres, by the earth, and by all vnder the earth, by the braines and all the hairie scalpe of my mother, by my head, and all the strength of my soule and bodie, by the holy great Mahomet, and by
B my Circumcision, that I thee my brother and sonne Bethlem Gabor, succeeding king of HVNGARIE, in no manner of way, in thy great and waightie affaires will leaue, though it be to the ouerthrow of my kingdome, to bee brought to nothing, vntill there shall bee no more left but my selfe, or foure or fiue Turkes at the most, yet will I bee still obliged to defend thee, and all those that doe any wayes appertaine vnto thee. And if thou shalt haue need of mee, I will bee alwayes readie to goe with thee. And in case this my promise shall in any wise bee frustrated, then let Gods iustice fall vpon my head and destroy mee and my posteritie, and wipe away whatsoeuer belongeth vnto mee, and gather it together into a rocke of stone or substance of earth, and that the earth may cleaue asunder and swallow mee vp bodie and soule.

Dated at CONSTANTINOPLE the fifth of Ianuarie 1619.

Bethlem Gabor being assured by this oath of protection made by the graund Seigniour, in the beginning of the yeare 1620, hee called an assembly of the Estates of HVNGARIE at PRESBVRG, whither Embassadors were sent from the king of BOHEMIA, and the States of that countrey, with the incorporated prouinces, where a perpetuall league was concluded betwixt them, and afterwards concluded at PRAGVE, where among other articles it was con-D cluded, that for as much as necessitie did chiefly require, that a peace should bee concluded, and inuiolably kept with the Turke, therefore a new embasie should bee sent to the Graund Seignior from all the confederate kingdomes and prouinces, and that Bethlem Gabor should take vpon him the chiefe care of that businesse, but yet in such sort, as the Bohemians and incorporated prouinces should send their Embassadours with the Hungarians, and beare their shares of all that should bee disbursed, as well for the presents, as for the Embassadours charges.

A league betwixt the prince of Transyluania Bohemians, and Hungarians.

In Iune following Bethlem Gabor went to an assembly of the Estates of HVNGARIE at NEVHEVSALL, where he propounded diuers heads vnto the States: That he desired nothing more than to restore the kingdome of HVNGARIE so miserably afflicted to libertie, and that they might enioy their Religion and priuiledges: That he had spared no cost for the lawfull defence of the countrey, and for a testimonie that he desired peace, he had refused the crown
E which the Estates offered him at PRESBVRG: That the ground of peace was to maintaine the league which they had begun with the Bohemians: That he had alwayes desired peace with the helpe of other princes, so as it were sincere and without fraud or deceit, for the obtaining whereof he had assisted his confederats miserably afflicted: That he knew for certaine the Emperour desired not peace but warre, hauing suffered the Cossackes to enter into HVNGARIE, and to spoile many places with fire and sword, and denied passage for the Embassadors of BOHEMIA and AVSTRIA, for this cause they were not now to treat of peace but of warre, and to consult how it might be begun and maintained: for the leuying of money which is the sinewes of warre: for the furnishing of their forts vpon the frontiers, and for the speedie sending of Embassadours to the Turkish Emperour, least being ingaged in F an intestine warre, there might bee some attempts made vpon those bordring forts. Hauing deliuered his minde vnto the Estates, there came diuers Embassadors thither from BOHEMIA, AVSTRIA, SILESIA, and LVSATIA, VENICE, POLAND, and TVRKIE: The Venetian Embassadour was content their Commonwealth should enter into the league, and the Turke made offer to conclude a perpetuall league with them.

Bethlem Gabor proclaimed king of Hungarie.

On the fiue and twentieth day of Auguſt Bethlem Gabor prince of TRANSYLVANIA was G proclaimed king of HVNGARIE by the Palatine, at the inſtance of the Turkiſh Embaſſadour, and with the conſent and applauſe of moſt part of the Eſtates of the countrey: after which hee leuied a great armie of thirtie (ſome ſay fiftie) thouſand horſe and foot, and made many enſignes with diuers Emblemes and deuices, which being knowne, the Proteſtants of VIENNA, with the conſent of the Emperour, wrote vnto him, humbly intreating him to ſpare the citie and countrey, for their innocent wiues and childrens ſakes: but in the meane time all the citizens were commaunded to make prouiſion of victualls for ſixe moneths.

A viſion ſeene at Medina Talnabi.

There came newes to CONSTANTINOPLE of a ſtrange apparition or viſion, which was H ſeene at MEDINA TALNABI in ARABIA, whereas Mahomet their great prophet was buried, to viſit whoſe tombe the Turks vſe to go in pilgrimage, but they muſt firſt go to MECHA, which is ſome few daies iourny off, and there they take a ticket from the grand Seigniors Beglerbeg, elſe they are not alowed to go to MEDINA. This viſion continued three weeks together, which terrified the whole country, for that no man could diſcouer the truth thereof. About the 20 of September, there fell ſo great a tempeſt, and ſo fearefull a thunder about midnight, as the heauens were darkened, and thoſe that were awake, almoſt diſtracted, but the vapours being diſperſed, and the element cleare, the people might read in Arabian characters theſe wordes in the firmament: O why will you beleeue in lies? Betweene two and three in the morning, there was ſeene a woman in white compaſſed about with the Sunne, hauing a cheerefull I countenance, and holding in her hand a booke: comming from the Northweſt, oppoſite againſt her were armies of Turks, Perſians, Arabians, and other Mahometans, ranged in order of battell, and ready to charge her, but ſhee kept her ſtanding, and onely opened the booke, at the ſight whereof theſe armies fled, and preſently all the lampes about Mahomets tombe went out; for as ſoone as euer the viſion vaniſhed (which was commonly an houre before ſunne riſing) a murmuring wind was heard, whereunto they imputed the extinguiſhing of the lampes. The auncient pilgrimes of Mahomets race, who after they haue viſited this place neuer vſe to cut their haire, were much amazed, for that they could not conceiue the meaning of this viſion: onely one of the Deruices (which is a ſtrict religious order amongſt the Turkes, like vnto the Capuchins among the Papiſtes, and liue in contem- K plation) ſtepped vp verie boldly, and made a ſpeech vnto the companie, which incenſed them much againſt him, ſo as this poore prieſt for his plaine dealing loſt his life, as you ſhall heare.

A Deruice ſpeech vnto the Turkes.

„ The ſumme of his ſpeech was this: That the world had neuer but three true religions, euery „ one of which had a prophet; firſt God choſe the Iewes, and did wonders for them in EGYPT, „ and brought them foorth by their Prophet Moiſes, who preſcribed them a law, wherein he „ would haue maintained them, if they had not bin obſtinat and rebellious, and fallen to idola- „ trie: whereupon he gaue them ouer, and ſcattered them vpon the face of the earth. Then pre- „ ſently after he raiſed a new Prophet, who taught the Chriſtian religion. This good man the „ Iewes condemned and crucified for a ſeducer of the people, not moued with the pietie of his L „ life, his great miracles, nor his doctrine. Yet after his death, the preaching of a few fiſhermen, „ did ſo moue the hearts of men, as the greateſt monarchs of the world bowed to his verie title, „ and yeelded to the command of his miniſters. But it ſeems they grew as corrupt as the Iewes, „ their Church being diſmembred with the diſtinction of the Eaſt and Weſt, committing ido- „ latrie againe by ſetting vp of Images, with many other idle ceremonies, beſides the corrupti- „ on of their liues, ſo as God was weary of them too, and not only ſent diuiſions among them, „ but forſook them, diſpoſſeſſing them of their chiefeſt cities HIERVSALEM and CONSTAN- „ TINOPLE, yet God is ſtill the gouernour of the world, and prouides himſelfe of another pro- „ phet and people, raiſing our great Mahomet, and giuing way to our nation, ſo as no doubt we „ ſhall be happie for euer, if wee can ſerue this God aright, and take example by the fall of o- M „ thers. But ahlas! I tremble to ſpeake it, wee haue erred in euerie point, and wilfully bro- „ ken our firſt inſtitutions, ſo as God hath manifeſted his wrath by euident ſignes and „ tokens, keeping our Prophet from vs, who prefixed a time to returne with all happi- „ neſſe to his people, ſo as there are now fourtie yeares paſt by our account: wherefore „ this ſtrange and fearefull viſion is a prediction of ſome great troubles and alterations.

For

A For either the opening of this booke in the womans hand, doth foretell our falling away » from the first intent of our law, whereat these armed men departed as confounded with the » guilt of their own consciences; or else it signifies some other booke in which we haue not yet » read, and against which no power shall preuaile, so as I feare our religion will be proued cor- » rupt, and our Prophet an Impostor, and then this Christ whom they talke of, shall shine like » the sunne, and set vp his name euerlastingly. Hitherto the companie was silent, but hearing him speake so boldly, they charged him with blasphemie; & knowing their law, which makes all blasphemie capitall, they presently condemned him, and hauing the Beglerbegs consent and warrant, they put him to death.

B As their rage against him was violent, so their execution was extraordinarie, for they neither cut of his head nor strangled him, as they vsually doe to malefactors, but they tortured him by degrees: for stripping him first naked, they gaue him a hundred blowes on the soles of his feet with a flat cudgell, vntill the blood issued forth, the poore priest crying continually on the woman that opened the booke. After which they tooke a bulls pizzell, and beat all his body vntill his sinewes crackt, & in the end they laid him vpon a wheele, and with an Indian sword made of sinews, they brake his bones to pieces, the poore man crying to the last gaspe, O thou woman with the booke, saue me, and so he died: At which time there was a fearefull tempest. The Beglerbeg sent certaine Spahis to the port of SIDON to imbarke for CONSTANTINOPLE, to the end they might aduertise the Emperour of these tidings. The Dervice put to death for his speech.

C Sultan Osman from the first entrance into his raigne was freed from all cares of forraine war, or intestine combustions, for he had that happinesse (being himselfe very yong, and not able to gouerne so potent an estate) as by the counsell and assistance of Halil Bassa his graund Visier, hee had forced the king of PERSIA to demaund a peace, and to pay the tribute which had bin formerly promised. His rebels in ASIA were all pacified, and the truce with the Emperour (which had been somewhat interrupted by misinterpretation, or the practise of bad ministers) was newly confirmed a little before his comming to the crowne, only MOLDAVIA had been the theator of warre for some yeares, where his father had exercised his armes, and imployed his forces, to aduaunce whom he pleased to be Vayuod of that countrey, against another partie that was supported by the Polonians, as you haue formerly heard. Michna

D prince of VALACHIA, being made Vayuod of MOLDAVIA by Achmat, and the Polonian partie wholly ouerthrowne in the yeare one thousand six hundred and sixteene, he enioyed it not long: but whether he died of a naturall death, or fell into disgrace with the graund Seignior, I doe not read: yet I finde that after him there was another Vayuod or prince of MOLDAVIA, who is yet liuing, but in disgrace with the Sultan, his name is Gasparo Gratsiani: and to the end you may vnderstand, that the Turkes neuer respects the birth and qualitie of any man in their aduauncements, I will relate what this man was, from the mouth of him that knew him verie well.

This Gasparo was borne at GRETZ, (a Towne of great strength belonging to the Archdukes of AVSTRIA, by the which a braunch of that house is distinguished from

E the rest, and whereof the Emperour now raigning is the head) but being a man of small fortune, and little expectance in his owne countrey, hee went to CONSTANTINOPLE, and put himselfe in seruice with Sir Thomas Glouer, before that hee was Embassadour for his Maiestie to the Graund Seignior, vnder whom he learned both to write and read the Turkish tongue. After which he came with him into ENGLAND, and there by his recommendation was imploied to CONSTANTINOPLE for the redeeming of yong sir Thomas Sherley, who was then a prisoner among the Turkes. Hauing performed his charge orderly, and being come to VENICE with the young knight, hearing that sir Thomas Glouer was sent Embassadour to the Graund Seignior, he left sir Thomas Sherley, and went to CONSTANTINOPLE to his old master, where he was imploied yearely to buy or exchange Christians for Turks, carying

F the Christians into ITALIE, and so returning Turkes for them. About the end of Achmats raigne arriuing at CONSTANTINOPLE with a ship full of Turkes, which he had exchanged, he acquainted the Bassa Visier with the good seruice he had done vnto the grand Seignior, who demanding of what country he was and his breeding, asked him if he would vndertake a seruice which should be for his aduancement, which was to go vnto the Emperour to reconcile all difficulties concerning the peace, wherein he carried himselfe so discreetly, as Commissioners were appointed, who concluded all difficulties as you haue heard. But before his returne home, the Graund Seigniour was dead, yet hee pressed the Bassa for the performance of his promise, desiring him, that hee might bee made Vayuod of MOLDAVIA, which the Bassa effected: but the presents he gaue aduanced him more than his merits. Since he grew into some disgrace; so as the Graund Seigniour making choice of another Vayuod, gaue charge to certaine Capigis, to go into MOLDAVIA to strangle Gasparo, and that they should take foure hundred Turkes vpon the frontiers to assist them: But Gasparo hauing good spies at CONSTANTINOPLE, who aduertised him of their desligne, resolued to preuent them; wherefore taking some troupes with him, hee met them vpon the way, and cut them all in pieces; then returning to YAS, he slew one thousand Turkes. After which he fled into POLAND with two thousand horse, from whence they write that he hath made diuers incursions into MOLDAVIA, and committed great spoiles vpon the Turkes, being assisted by the Cossackes, and keepes possession of the countrie, although there be another Vayuod made by the Turke.

Gaspar made Vayuod of Moldauia.

He is in disgrace and flies into Polonia.

Sultan Osman seemes to be much incensed against the Polonians, as well for this support, as for former quarrells, making it his colour for the leuying of the greatest armie that hath beene seene since that Solyman went vnto the siege of AGRIA, consisting as it is said of three hundred thousand men, hauing drawne down all his forces out of ASIA. God knowes where he will imploy it, but it is much to be feared that he will make vse of this diuision betwixt Christian princes, who should vnite their willes and forces, to oppose them against the common enemie of Christendome, who watcheth only to get an aduantage, little regarding his word and promise.

The Turks preparation to armes.

The Turke hauing no imployment for his forces by land, sent three score gallies to sea, to make some enterprise vpon the Christians. They came into the Mediterranean sea, and hauing coasted the Island of SICILIE, they sent twentie gallies to land in the kingdome of NAPLES, where they surprised the town of MANFREDONIA, and spoiled it, carrying away foureteene or fifteene hundred captiues, and so retyred againe to sea. The rest of their fleet lay about VELLONA in the gulfe, which made the Spaniards iealous that the Venetian had beene acquainted with this enterprise. And since there is newes, that the Gallions and Galliots of ALGIERS, haue taken IVISA, a small Island of foure miles compasse, neere vnto MAIORCA: It is a place of great importance, for that it hath a hauen, able to containe much shipping; for the guard whereof the king of SPAINE entertaines a great garrison, and it did much annoy them of ALGIERS. They tooke the towne; but it is not yet certaine whether they haue taken the castle.

Manfredonia taken by the Turkes.

Iuisa taken by the Turkes.

This is all I could learne of the Turkes affaires since the yere 1609 vntill this present. The reader may obserue that since the raigne of Ottoman their first emperor, this great empire of the Turkes, is proudly built vpon the foure monarches of the world, that is to say, of the Assirian, Persian, Greeke, and Romane. For they enioy BABYLON, and all CHALDEA, with the countrie of the Medes: We haue seene them in TAVRIS the capitall citie of PERSIA, GREECE is subiect to the yoke of their command, CONSTANTINOPLE sometimes called New ROME by the transport of the Imperiall seat, is now made their throne, and so many prouinces and realmes which in former times depended vpon the Romane Empire, do now acknowledge their power; they are masters of the realms of EGYPT and CYPRES; the Islands of RHODES, METELINE, NEGREPONT, CIO, and many others acknowledge them, the empire of TREBISOND is theirs; the realme of COLCHOS now called MINGRELIA paies them tribute: they of TVNIS and ALGIER in AFFRICKE obey them; DALMATIA, the Illerians, Triballiens, the countries of TRANSYLVANIA, VALACHIA, and MOLDAVIA do them homage, and we see them commaund euen in the chiefe townes of the realmes of HVNGARIE: But all this power of the Ottomans had neuer beene so great nor so fearefull, but by the discord, diuision, and bad intelligence betwixt Christian princes, as you may reade in the course of this historie, as well in GREECE, at CONSTANTINOPLE, as in other parts of EVROPE, whereas these princes contending one with another, haue furnished matter and meanes to the Turke to dispossesse them of the chiefe pieces of their monarchies. They meaſure the continuance of their empire by the diſcord betwixt the princes of the beliefe of the name of Ieſus, and they confeſſe truely that this diuiſion is the onely cauſe of their greatneſſe, the which hath made them belieue, that among Chriſtians there was a bad Angell enemie to peace, which they call the ſtrong or powerfull ſpirit, which kindling the fire of reuenge and ambition in the hearts of great men, drawes from their affections the good of their beliefe, to entertaine them in perpetuall diſcord, during the which, they promiſe vnto themſelues a firme and an aſſured raigne. So the Mufti and the Taliſmans praying on Friday in their Moſques, demaund of their Prophet the circumſtance of this bad intelligence betwixt Chriſtian princes, to the end they may enioy the empire which they haue vniuſtly vſurped. Yet their Propheſies do not promiſe them a perpetuall poſſeſſion; behold one in their owne tongue, which hath alwaies made them feare the vnion of Chriſtians.

That is to ſay

Our Emperour ſhall come, he ſhall poſſeſſe the realme of an Infidell prince, he ſhall take the red apple, and make it ſubiect to his power: If at the ſeuenth yere of his command the Chriſtians ſword doth not aduance, he ſhall rule vnto the twelfth yeare, he ſhall build houſes, plant vines, compaſſe in gardens with hedges, and beget children: But after the twelfth yeare that he hath held the red apple, the Chriſtians ſword ſhall appeare and put the Turke to flight.

By the Infidell prince they vnderſtand a Chriſtian prince (for ſo they call them) and by the Red Apple an Imperiall towne ſtrong and important, in the which, and elſewhere the Turkes ſhall build houſes, that is to ſay, conuert holie Temples to the vſe of the Mahometane impietie, for by this word to build, they that haue commented vpon this propheſie vnderſtand vſurpation of the houſes of God: Plant vines, by theſe words they ſignifie the extent of the Turkiſh Empire, and the ſetling of their collonies, as we ſee in HVNGARIA and TRANSYLVANA: compaßing in Gardens, that is to ſay, they ſhall fortifie the townes which they haue taken from their enemies: Beget children, extend the Mahometan religion, far in the Chriſtians countries. But after the twelfth yeare &c. within a certaine time beſt knowne to God, his diuine maieſtie, opening the eyes of his clemencie vpon the Chriſtians, will vnite the willes of their princes, kindle their affections with a holie zeale, and bleſſing their armes, will make them victorious ouer the Turke, whom he will baniſh out of the Eaſt, and chaſe into SCITHIA from whence they came to bee a ſcourge vnto Chriſtendome. Theſe are my wiſhes, wherein I hope all good Chriſtians do concurre. The expoſition of their propheſie.

Hauing runne ouer the occurrents which haue happened in the Turkes eſtate for the ſpace of eleuen yeares, I muſt according to Maſter Knolles his method, conclude the worke with a deſcription of the Graund Seigniours Port or Court, of his Gouernment, Officers, Riches, Force, and Religion. The Turks (a people of SCITHIA) hauing like a violent deluge ouerthrowne a great part of the Eaſt, and taken diuers prouinces, being expelled from HIERVSALEM by Godfrey of BOVILLON, and the Chriſtians, their remainder retired to NICEA where they liued without any head or ſoueraigne commaunder, vntill that Ottoman, about the yeare of our Redeemer 1300, by practiſe, made himſelfe ſole and abſolute monarch. His ſonne conquering diuers prouinces, remoued his imperiall ſeat to PRVSIA, now called BVRSIA, the chiefe aboad of the kings of BITHINIA. Amurath the firſt (being drawne in by the Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE to ſuccour him, and allured with the wealth of EVROPE) turned his armes againſt him, taking diuers prouinces and townes from him, amongſt others ADRIANOPOLIS, which he made the ſeat and reſidence of the Turkiſh Emperours, in the The beginning of the Turkiſh Empire.

yeare 1363. But Mahomet the second hauing taken the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, and expelled the Emperour in the yeare 1453, he made it the royall seat of the Ottomans, for which he had great reason, being one of the faireſt and ſweeteſt ſeats of the world. G

Deſcription of Conſtantinople.

CONSTANTINOPLE hath in circuit by the opinion of ſome writers fifteene or ſixteene miles, and is called by the Turkes themſelues STAMBVLL or STAMBOLDA, the ſea beating vpon it vpon the North and South ſides: towards the Eaſt it is diuided from ASIA by a large channell, which runneth from the one ſea to the other, and is about ſeuen miles in length. The citie is built vpon the declining of a hill, in which there are many rare ſingularities which I omit being deſcribed elſewhere. There are in this citie ſeuen little hills, vpon the which are built ſeuen principall Moſques or Churches, by ſeuerall Emperours, whereof the faireſt and moſt ſtately is that of Sultan Solyman. Vpon the North ſide of the citie ſtandeth the Graund Seigniours Pallace or Seraglio, commonly called by the name of the Port, the which hath on the one ſide thereof the ſea, and of the other ſide of it the hauen; the other two being towards the citie, being about three miles in compaſſe, ſome write of foure. It is walled about, and within it are many gardens, orchards, medowes, and woods. Being entred into the firſt Port (which hath double gates of yron) into a large court, on the left hand there ſtands a building like vnto a Turkiſh Moſquee, which now the Graund Seigniour vſeth for a ſtore-houſe, wherein are great ſtore of armes which are for the defence of his Seraglio. And on the other ſide of this Court are ſeuerall gardens walled in, from which they paſſe to another court with a gate like vnto the former, where are targuers and cemitars hanging, and many porters attending, as at the former. After this they paſſe into another large court, which is planted with cypreſſe trees, and full of graſſe, where deere feed; but round about it is a cloiſter which is in length about ſix hundred and foure ſcore foot, and aboue fiue hundred in bredth, paued with ſtone, and couered with lead, it being ſupported with one hundred and fortie pillars of white and gray marble, ſtanding vpon baſſes of copper, with capitals of the ſame, vpon the North ſide whereof ſtands the Diuano, whereas the Viſier Baſſa and the other Baſſaes ſit in counſell, and heare cauſes of importance, whereof we will ſpeake hereafter. Attendants vpon the Grand Seigniour.

In this Seraglio the Grand Seigniour hath many chambers which are richly appointed, wherein he remaines, and there he hath ſix young men which attend his perſon and the ſeruice of his chamber, whereof two waite daily, and at night they watch when he ſleepes, the one of them at his head, and the other at his feet, with two torches burning in their hands. In the morning (as Sanzouino writes) when the Graund Seigniour attiers himſelfe, they put into one of his pockets a thouſand aſpers, and into the other pocket twentie duckats of gold, the which if hee giue not away that day, is their fee at night, neither (as they ſay) doth hee euer put on the ſame clothes: and whenſoeuer he goes to hunting, or to any other exerciſe, (beſides the money which hee hath with him) his Caſnadar Baſſa or chiefe Treaſuror ſtill followes him with great ſtore of money to giue away. The office of theſe ſix young men (who are changed as it pleaſeth the Graund Seigniour) is diſtinct, for the one carries his ſhooes, the ſecond his bow and arrows, the third his veſt, the fourth a veſſell with water, the fift carries a ſeat, and the ſixt called Oda Baſſa is head of the chamber. He hath dayly a great number of perſons reſident in his pallace, imployed in their ſeuerall charges, ſome in one place, ſome in another, vnder their ſeuerall commaunders: But among all the great men in his court theſe are of chiefeſt eminencie and note.

Firſt the Capi Aga, that is to ſay, the mouth of the grand ſeigniour, by whom the Sultan ſpeaketh to ſuch as haue any great ſuit vnto him; for no embaſſadour it admitted vnto him, but at his firſt arriuall when he deliuers his letters of credit and his preſents, and when he hath any buſines to treat of he repaires to the Viſier Baſſa or his Aga.

The ſecond is Caſnadar Baſſa, the chiefe Treaſurour of the houſhold, or ſuperintendent of the Treaſurors. M

The third Chilergi Baſſa, chiefe cupbearer.

The fourth is Seraglio Agaſi, ſteward or maſter of the houſhold.

A The ſixt and laſt is Boſtangi Baſſa, chiefe Gardiner, and ouerſeer of all his gardens, Captaine of his Iamoglans, and ſtearer of of his Barge whenſoeuer he goeth by water. He hath a Protogero or Lieutenant, and many Gardiners vnder him, which are called Boſtangi, who when they come out of the Seraglio, become Ianizaries, Solacchi, or Capigi, according to their qualities.

Theſe ſixe Officers of the Sultans houſe aboue mentioned haue no authoritie out of his pallace, yet the greateſt Baſſaes ſtand in awe of them, and feare them, for that they haue free acceſſe vnto the Sultan, and haue dayly opportunitie to incenſe him againſt them: for by their ſecret ſuggeſtion and falſe informations, manie of the greateſt Baſ-
B ſaes are manie times ſuddenly and vndeſeruedly cut off in the height of all their pompe and glorie.

Hee hath many Mutes or dumbe men attending about him, whereof eight bee his daily companions and play-fellowes in the Seraglio, in whoſe companie hee takes great delight: beſides manie others to the number of fourtie, which attend vpon him as pages. They are all borne deafe and dumbe, yet by long practiſe they growe ſo perfect, as they will vnderſtand any thing that ſhall bee acted vnto them by ſignes and geſtures; and will themſelues by the geſture of their eyes, bodies, handes and feet, deliuer matters of great difficultie, to the great admiration of ſtrangers. The Sultans dumbe men.

The Graund Seigniour hath within his pallace a Seraglio of young men to the num-
C ber of fiue hundred, from eight yeares of age to twentie: theſe are the well-fauouredſt and beſt proportioned of all the tribute children which hee draweth from GRECIA and NATOLIA, and they are choſen out of his Seraglioes at PERA, ADRIANOPOLIS, and other places, and brought to this to bee bred vp, where they are inſtructed in diuers Arts according to their diſpoſition, but eſpecially to read and write, and in the doctrine of their Lawe, and to ride, there being a great number of horſes kept within this Seraglio for their exerciſe, and for the Eunuches. They neuer goe out of the Seraglio till the Sultan thinks them to be of fit age to vndergoe ſome charge, and then he makes them Spacoglani, or Silichtari, and to ſome he giues greater places, according to their valour, or the fauour they haue gotten with him. A Seraglio of young men.

D Hee hath in like manner about foureſcore Mutaferache, that is to ſay, Launce-bearers to the Graund Seigniour: which carrie his Launce whenſoeuer hee goeth to field, and acknowledge no other Commaunder, and in time by his fauour or their merites, are made Captaines. They that carry his Launce.

Hee hath alwayes aboue one thouſand Eunuches entertained in ſeuerall places, where-
E of ſome of them are in verie great credit with him, and can preuaile much: they are called Hadurni, many of them are imployed to attend his Concubines and Virgines in his Seraglio. They are not onely depriued of their genitors, but in their youth they haue their whole priuities ſmoothed off by their bellies, and in their turbants they beare ſhort quills of ſiluer, through which they make water. This inhumane cuſtome was firſt inuented by Sultan Solyman, who ſeeing a Gelding make offer to couer a Mare, grewe ſuſpitious that they were able to doe ſome ſmall thing, notwithſtanding the loſſe of their genitors. The Sultans Eunuches.

The Graund Seigniour hath a Seraglio for his women without his pallace, in the F which there are alwayes foure or fiue hundred young virgines, the faireſt of the Chriſtians children, which he gathereth vp out of GRECIA for tribute. The Sultan repaires ſometime thither to make choice of ſuch as he ſhall like beſt for his pleaſure, whereof they are aduertiſed the day before by the Eunuches, that they may prepare themſelues in their beſt habits to giue him content. Being all in a roome, and ſtanding vpon either ſide, the Sultan enters attended by an Eunuch or two, and viewes them; to her that hee likes, hee caſtes a handkercher, (whereof hee hath many hanging at his girdle) and in this manner it may bee hee makes choice of halfe a dozen, the which his Eunuches obſeruing, they put them preſently into a coach, and are carried into another little Seraglio within his pallace. In this ſeraglio they haue good entertainment, and are apparelled in ſilke twice a yeare, and are tauhgt to make diuers workes by auncient matrons, and are attended on by the younger ſort. The Sultans Seraglio of women.

They

They haue many Eunuches with their Aga or Captaine, and they haue 100 Capigis and Ianizaries, which keepe their gates. When as the number of these virgine slaues decreaseth, and they haue not wherewithall to supplie them with their tributarie children, they send to the market in CONSTANTINOPLE, where they say there are daily tenne thousand slaues of all ages and sexes to be sold: and there they buy the faireſt they can get, but they will not haue them aboue eight yeares old, lest they should be corrupted before they come into the Turkes Seraglio. G

The estate of his concubines.

As for the other Seraglio within the Sultans palace, there remaines the Sultanaes with their children, and such other Concubines as he hath made choice of for his delight. Hee neuer marries, but when any one is brought vnto him, hee giues her an attire for her head of gold, and ten thousand aspers, causing her to liue in a chamber apart, increasing her daily maintenance. The first that beares him a child, is called Sultana, and is mistresse of all the rest, and most fauoured by him, as the chiefest of all his women, the rest as they are fauoured by the prince, are brought vnto him to haue his pleasure, and then returned backe againe: if they chance to be with child, they are put in the number of the Sultanaes, and are much respected by him. Such as the prince hath had the vse of, but no children by them, are giuen in marriage to his slaues, who are aduaunced to dignities, and made Gouernours of Countreyes. H

His guard, footmen, & porters.

He hath three hundred Sollacchi, which march continually about his person, and make as it were his guard, being vnder the commaund of the Aga of Ianizaries; they are richly attired, hauing lawne garments hanging downe beneath their knees, and ouer it a quilted waistcoate with halfe sleeues of taffatie, damaske, or satten, and on their heads caps and feathers like vnto the Captaine of the Ianazaries, and they attend on him with bowes and arrowes. Hee hath also still about him when he rides abroad fortie Peichi, that is to say, footmen or postes which runne wonderfull swiftly, and are still at hand to attend his commandements, where he shall please to imploy them: they weare long coates of cloth of gold with a broad girdle of the same, and cappes like vnto womens thimbles, with a horne of siluer and guilt standing vp before. There are about foure thousand Capigis or Porters which continually attend his pallace and seraglioes, they are attired like vnto the Ianizaries, and haue ouer them three Capigi Bassaes. These men are many times imployed to execute the Graund Seigniours commaundements, when hee will haue any great mans head, or his throat cut, as wee haue seene of late yeares in Gambolat Bassa, and in Nassuf Bassa, who was graund Visier to Achmat. I K

The Turkes gouernment.

The Graund Seigniors gouerment is so absolute, as they all tearme themselues his slaues, and no man how great soeuer can assure himselfe of his estate, no not of his life, but by the great Turkes speciall fauour. Hee commits the mannaging of his estate to such as haue abiured the Christian Religion, and haue beene brought by way of tithing in their infancies from GREECE and NATOLIA, and afterwards for their merits are aduaunced to great dignities, as Bassaes, Beglerbegs, and such other. The prince hath a Court or Councell which they call Diuano, and this is held within the Seraglio foure dayes in the weeke, that is to say, Saterday, Sunday, Munday and Tuesday, where they treat of matters of state, and afterwards of the affaires of priuate men. To this Councell are admitted the graund Visier, eight or nine Bassaes who are also called Visiers, and are continually resident at CONSTANTINOPLE, (for there are many more which are imployed abroad in the conduct of armies or gouernment of countries) the Beglerbegs and others. At the rising of the court or councell, the Grand Visier informes the Sultan of all the proceedings in particular, wherin he dares not dissemble, for that the prince hath a window ioining to the Diuano, where he may heare and see any thing and not be seene. He seldome impugnes what they haue resolsolued, vnlesse it be to moderate some rigorous sentence, or to giue answere to some embassador, and what he himselfe concludes is irreuokable. L M

The Turks iustice.

Their suits are verie short, for they haue no aduocates to breed delaies, as they haue in Christendome; yet commonly he that bribes most speeds best, for the Turkes are the most couetous and corrupt nation in the world, neither will they doe any man a kindnesse without a fee; and yet they are not sure to enioy any thing they get no longer than it shall please

A the prince. They punish crimes with great seueritie, and speedily, the fact being prooued, which doth so terrifie them as by the report of such as haue conuersed long there, you shall seldome see a murther or a theft committed by any Turke; and if any foule fact be committed, it is most commonly done by Grecians.

The chiefe of the Graund Seigniors Councell, is the graund Visier, who weares the princes signet, and is as it were the Lieutenant generall of the whole monarchie: he hath authoritie ouer the other Bassaes, and they are bound to yeeld him an account of their imployments. Hee is still about the prince his person, and is not sent abroad for any imploiment vnlesse it bee for an important warre, as they haue done of late yeares against the Persian. The Graund Visier.

B When the Visier is sent abroad, he makes choice of one of the Bassaes to be his Lieutenant, and to execute his authoritie, and hee is called Chimacham. Mechmet Bassa is at this present chiefe Visier.

Next vnto the Bassa (which is as much to say as great Lord) follow the Beglerbegs, and haue their places in court next vnto them. They are men of great authoritie, and haue the commaund of great kingdomes and armies, vnder whose obedience are diuers Sanzackes, which are sent as gouernours into prouinces during the princes pleasure. These are men of great experience, and haue commaund ouer the Spahi, and Timariots, the Turkes chiefe forces on horseback, whom they call continually to exercise their armes. There is one Beglerbeg of GREECE, which hath all the countries in EVROPE in the Turkes dominions vnder The Beglerbegs and Sanzacks.

C his charge, and this is the first of all the Beglerbegs, who hath vnder him aboue thirtie Sanzackes. There are six other Beglerbegs in ASIA, whereof the first is he of NATOLIA or ASIA the lesse. Hee hath the gouernment of PONTVS, BITHINIA, and other kingdomes, and hath vnder him twelue Sanzackes. The Beglerbeg of CARAMANIA with seuen Sanzackes. The Beglerbeg of ALADVLEY, vnder whose commaund are seuen Sanzackes. The Beglerbeg of AMAZIA and TOCCATO, hauing foure Sanzackes. There is also one in MESOPOTAMIA, and vnder his commaund twelue Sanzackes or Gouernours of prouinces. There is likewise a Beglerbeg of DAMAS, SVRIA, and IVDEA, who hath vnder him twelue Sanzacks. And there is one of CAIRE, who commaunds ouer sixteene Sanzackes, his charge extends to the Arabians, but they are not so obedient as the Turkes other countries.

D As for the Turkes forces, they consist of horsemen, footmen, and fleets at sea. His horse- The great Turkes forces.
men consist of Spahi, Timari, Spachoglani, Silictari and Olofagi, who haue assignations of lands for the intertainement of them and their horses. For no man can enioy any possessions, but he is enioyned to intertaine a certaine number of souldiors proportionable to the reuenues of the land: so as the Gouernour or Bassa is alwayes bound to haue this number ready to march when they are called. Of these Timariots they are able to raise about 150000 The Timariots.
horse alwaies readie at the first call, for the which the prince disburseth not a penie, for in regard of the land which is allotted them, they are bound to maintaine themselues, their horse and armes in the warre. Whereseuer the Turke conquereth any countrey, hee diuides it among his souldiors, assigning 4000 aspers yearely (which is little aboue ten pound sterling)

E to euery one for himselfe and his horse, and so proportionably if he haue more land. These horsemen are much pestered with armes when they go to war: for they haue a iacke, a speare with a little white banner, a caliuer hanging vnder his left arme, a cemitar, a bow and arrowes at his girdle, and a battle axe at his saddle bow. And of these kind of horsmen they say there are 80000 in GREECE, besides an infinite number in his other countries. This Turkish Cauallerie worke two great effects, for they serue as a support to his estate, to suppresse all seditions, and they are readie to vndertake any enterprise. Besides these he entertaines many horsmen about his person, whereof some are Spahi, and these are Christian slaues bred vp young The Spahi.
in the princes seraglio, who by their merits attaine to that degree, and afterwards to greater dignities. They are alwaies attending about the princes person whereseuer hee goes, being

F commonly thirteene hundred.

The Caripices are held for the flower of all his horsemen, being in number about 800, who The Caripices & Spachoglani march still about the princes person during the warres. The Spachoglani which is as much to say as yong men on horsebacke, are aboue three thousand, who haue yearely pensions in money, which they are bound to receiue yearely at CONSTANTINOPLE, or else they are held as dead men. In the warres they march on the right hand of the graund Seigniour, and are knowne from the Spahis by the banners of their launces, which haue two points and of diuers colours, the others being pointed and all white, but they are armed alike. They are men at armes of a good fashion, and are commonly aduanced by the Sultan to higher places. They haue a Captaine or Aga of great esteeme, with a Lieutenant, and euerie twentie haue a Boluch Bassa. G

The Salichtari. The Salichtari are also horsemen, and lodge vpon the left hand of the prince being in number about 3000: Their breeding is like to the Spahi, and there is no difference betwixt them but in their march, the one hauing the right hand, and the other the left, which is the more honourable among the Turkes.

The Olofagi. There is yet another sort of horsemen, which they call Olofagi, being about 2000 in number, and they march on the right and left hand of the prince. These seuerall troupes are as it were a nurserie for all the chiefe officers of that empire, out of which they doe commonly chuse their great commanders. Besides they haue their mercinarie souldiors called Alcanzÿs, which come to serue the Turke from TARTARIA, VALACHIA, and MOLDAVIA. H

The Ianizaries and their breeding. As for his foot forces they consist chiefely in Ianizaries, into which number they haue not vsed to inroll many of ASIA, whom they haue held faint hearted, but those of EVROPE, who haue alwaies had the reputation to be valiant. Their manner to entertaine this discipline, is, to send euerie three yeares into all the prouinces of EVROPE, from whence they bring ten or twelue thousand Christian children as a tribute, making choice of such as haue any shew of magnanimitie, agilitie, or courage, which are parts fit for a souldiour. These children being brought to CONSTANTINOPLE and visited, some of them are sent into NATOLIA, CARAMANIA, and other prouinces to dig and weed the ground, where they forget their parents, countrie, and faith, and learne the language, and vices of them with whom they conuerse, and so become Mahometans. They continue in those places 3 or 4 yeares, without any charge to the prince, being entertained by them for whom they labour; after which time they are called home, and put into the Sultans Seraglios at PERA, ADRIANOPOLIS, and other places. But they that haue the best faces and are most actiue, are reserued for the princes seruice. I

The Aiamoglani. These children being brought into the princes Seraglios, are of two sorts; the one are called Aiamoglani, that is to say, simple boy: they are instructed by seueere masters in diuers manuall and painefull exercises, as shoomakers, gardeners, and such like base trades. Their feeding and apparrell is verie meane, and for the most part they lie in great and spacious roomes, like vnto religious men, hauing a light continually burning, and guards about them. These haue libertie to go abroad, who after the age of twentie yeares, are dismissed, whereof some are sent into the Sultans gardens, which are many and great; others are imploied as car-men to carrie wood, hay, water and other prouision for the pallace, and some are sent to the kitchins and stables; yet when places fall they are preferred to be Ianizaries, and haue competent pensions to maintaine them during their liues. The least hath fiue aspers a day, and none aboue eight, and the Spahis ten. They are attired in long blew gownes girt with a broad girdle, and on their heade they haue long yellow caps without brims, and sharpe like vnto sugar loaues: And of these Aiamoglanes there are alwaies aboue twentie thousand which serue to supplie his armies. K L

The Ich-Oglani. The other sort of youthes, which are bred vp in the Turkes seraglios or nurseries, are called Ich-Oglani, that is to say, chamber pages being the choice of all the Christians children for proportion and fauonr, and these are better bred vp than the Aiamogloni, and come to better preferment, of whom we haue formerly made mention; for the meanest places these young men attaine vnto at the first is to be Spahies, or to attend vpon the grand seigniour as his chamberlaines and pages. And many of them hauing extraordinarie parts are suddenly aduanced to places of great dignitie. Of these the prince hath euer 5000, who vntill they come vnto the age of twentie yeares are neuer suffered to go out of their seraglio, nor to see any person but such as instruct them and attend vpon them.

The Ianizaries. The Ianizaries (who are the grand seigniors chiefe strength on foot) are raised out of Christians children, bred vp in these nurseries as we haue said, where they are taught to shoot with their bowes and arrowes, to vse the harquebuse, and all other weapons fit for seruice; and are at length inrolled among the Ianizaries, and are held the most valiant and resolute souldiors among all the Turkes. There are commonly resident in CONSTANTINOPLE and thereabouts M

A abouts 24000 of theſe Ianizaries when as the grand ſeigniour is there, (for in his whole eſtate he hath a far greater number) vnder their Aga or Captaine generall, which is a place of great credit, but not like vnto any of their Baſſaes; the great Turke fearing to ioine power and authoritie together. Being once Ianizaries, they are either ſent to the wars, or put in garriſon, or elſe they remaine at the Sultans court (which they call Port) where they haue certaine ſpacious places for their dwelling, like to religious houſes, where they liue vnder their commaunders: And the younger ſerue the ancient with great reſpect. All the Ianizaries of one ſquadron eat together at one table, and ſleepe in certaine long halls, and if any one chance to be abſent all night, he ſhal (the next night) be beaten with a cudgell, which he takes ſo patiently,
B as he kiſſeth his hand that hath thus corrected him. They are much reſpected and feared of all men, and are diuerſly imployed in the citie; as to ſee the peace and good orders kept, to looke to the prices of things, to arreſt malefactors, and to guard the gates. If they buy any thing they will haue it at their owne rate; they cannot be iudged but by their Aga or Captaine. There is ſeldome any one puniſhed with death by the courſe of iuſtice, without danger of a mutinie; and therefore they execute them very ſecretly. They haue many means to get money; for ſome attend vpon embaſſadors and keep their houſes, others go with trauellers, to guard them ſafely through the Turks Eſtate. They haue a great power in their princes election, ſo as to winne their loues euerie new emperor at his firſt comming to the crowne giues them a donatiue, and increaſeth their pay, preſuming vpon their valour and multitude.
C They many times commit ſtrange inſolencies vpon any diſcontents; as in firing of houſes, brauing the Baſſaes, and ſometimes bearding the Sultan himſelfe, as you may read in this Hiſtorie.

The chiefe ſtrength of the Turkes forces conſiſts in theſe Ianizaries; and yet there are other ſorts of footmen, whereof ſome are called Acouizes, which is a forelorne hope, and receiue no pay, but march before the armie, and haue leaue to ſpoile; ſo as they giue the fift part of their bootie to the prince. There is another kind called Azapi: theſe are ſouldiors of ſmall effect, and ſerue rather with the pickaxe and ſpade than with the ſword: they are fitter to tire an enemie with their numbers, than to vanquiſh them with their vallor; and they are accuſtomed to fill vp ditches with their dead bodies to make a paſſage for the Ianizaries
D to aſcend vnto a breach. The grand ſeignior hath euer 6000 Gunners in pay whom they call Topegi. And for the guard of the powder and ſhot when the armie marcheth, there are alwaies 12000 men in pay, whom they call Iebegi.

Acouizes.

Azapi.

Topegi and Iebegi.

The grand ſeignior hath alſo certaine officers attending on him to the number of 3000, whom they call Chiaus, which are as it were ſergeants at armes. Theſe are men well eſteemed, and are often imployed in embaſſies to forreine princes: They alſo carrie letters and commendations from the prince or his chiefe Viſier, and they apprehend offendors. Theſe neuer go to the war but when as the Sultan is there in perſon. They are commanded by a Chiaus Baſſa, who is of ſo great credit with all men (as Sanſouino writes) that when he is ſent by the grand ſeignior to any Baſſa, Sanzack, or Cadi, with order to haue any mans head cut off,
E he is obeyed, although he haue no warrant in writing, as if the prince were there himſelfe, and commanded it.

The Chiaus.

Thus we haue ſet downe the grand ſeigniors forces at land, whoſe numbers are ſo great, as in ſhew they ſhould breed confuſion and ruine themſelues; but they keepe verie good order and diſcipline, ſo as in that point they yeeld not to any. They liue of a little bread baked in the aſhes, with rice and the powder of fleſh dried in the ſunne: They may drinke no wine, and there are no women ſeene in their armies: they obſerue a wonderfull ſilence, and all the ſouldiors are gouerned by the becke of the hand, or any ſhew of the countenance. Quarrels and thefts are ſeuerely puniſhed. When they march they dare not enter into any corne fields nor vines. The valiant are aſſured of preferments, and cowards of puniſhment.

The Turkes diſcipline in their armies.

F Hauing ſpoken ſufficiently of their land forces, let vs ſee what ſtrength he hath at ſea: they haue great ſtore of foreſts for the building of ſhips; neither want they good ſhipwrights, for that couetouſneſſe hath drawen many Chriſtian carpenters into the grand ſeigniors arſenal: And he hath great numbers of men trained vp in marine affaires, in regard of the gallies which he hath at MITILENE, RHODES, CYPRES, and ALEXANDRIA, and for the retreate hee giues pyrats at TVNIS, BONA, BVGIA, and ALGIERS, from whence he drawes commaunders and and his best mariners, as hath been seene by experience in the enterprises of MALTA, GVLETTE, and elsewhere. G

The Turkes reuenues.

To maintaine these great forces, it is requisite he should haue the sinews of war; yet his ordinarie reuenews (considering his large dominions) are not so great, as in reason they should be: for some are of opinion, that he hath not aboue eight millions of gold for his ordinarie reuenew; for which they giue diuers reasons: first, that the Turks haue no care but of armes, the which do rather ruine than inrich a countrie: secondly, they consume so many men in their enterprises, as they scarce leaue sufficient to manure their land, so as the subiects (despairing to enioy their wealth and necessarie commodities, which they might get by their labour and industrie) imploy not themselues to worke nor trafficke, no more than necessitie shall H constraine them: for to what purpose is it say they to sow that another man must reape? or to reape that which another will consume? And for this reason you shall see in the Turkes estate whole countries lie wast, & many times great dearth which growes by the want of men to manure their land; for that the countrie men for the most part either die in the voyages which they make, or in carrying victuals, and other necessarie things for their armies; for of 10000 which they draw from their houses to row in their gallies, scarce the fourth part returns to their houses, by reason of the great toyles they indure. Another reason why the Sultans reuenues be no greater, is, for that when he conquers any countrie, he assignes the lands to his Timarri, who are bound to maintaine so many men and so many horses according to the proportion of land which he giues them, reseruing no rent. I

But although his ordinarie reuenues be no greater than we haue spoken, yet hee drawes great profit by his extraordinaries, especially by confiscations and presents; for being all his slaues, no man enioyeth any thing longer than it pleaseth him: yea the Bassaes and greatest officers of that crowne, which oppresse his subiects, and gather together inestimable wealth, in the end for the most part, it comes into the Turks Casna or Treasurie. It is not strange there to send for any subiects head, vpon any suggestion whatsoeuer, which no man dare contradict: after which execution, his slaues and goods are sold in the market at CONSTANTINOPLE, and the mony applyed to the princes coffers. His presents also amount to great summes, for no embassador may come before him without a present, neither may any man expect any office or dignitie without mony: no gouernor being returned from his prouince, dares present himselfe to the Sultan emptie handed, neither are their presents of small price. The Sultans exchequer is gouerned by two Treasurers called Defterdari, who are more rightly gouernors of the reuenues, for that they keepe an account of the princes Casna or treasure, the one hath charge of the reuenues which are raised in NATOLIA, and the other in EVROPE. Also they draw great profits from their tributarie prouinces, especially, from VALACHIA, MOLDAVIA, and TRANSYLVANIA, where the princes maintaine themselues by presents and gifts; so as they change daily, for that they that offer most are aduanced, whereby they are forced to ruine the countrie to performe what they haue promised. K

But hauing spoken of the Turks forces and reuenues, whereby they maintain their armies to inuade their neighbors, we must now speake something of their laws whereby the subiects L are gouerned, which are institutions and answers of wise men, the which they hold as an interpretation of their Alcaron, which is the ground of their law. These institutions are contained in 12 volumes, treating of all things belonging to ciuile conuersation. Some prouinces of TVRKIE are gouerned by customes, and enioie their priuiledges, and their wise Iudges supplie many things which are not written. The Sultan makes choice of the wisest and worthiest person that can be found, of a sincere life according to their law, and he is called Mufti, that is, Interpreter of their Alcaron; he is (as it were) their high priest attending only matters of religion & faith: he is head of the church among the Turks, and decideth all questions of their law. He is of such eminencie as all the Bassaes are subiect to his direction: he abaseth not himselfe so much as to sit in the Diuano, only passeth through it when he is sent for by the M Sultan, who (so soone as he seeth him) riseth from his seat as it were, to honour him, and then they both sit downe face to face and so confer together.

The Mufti.

The Cadileſquiri.

They make triall of the sufficientest of their Iudges, before they chuse any, for which there are two Cadileſquiri Taliſmani, that is, Doctors of the law, and Examiners at CONSTANTINOPLE, or whereſoeuer the prince remaines; These examine the Iudges or Cadis of diuers prouin-

A prouinces: The one hath his charge ouer EVROPE, and is called Cadileſquirie Romly, before whom (after good information of his life, and ſufficiencie) he ſweares that he will do iuſtice to all men, and yeeld an account of his charge when he ſhalbe called. The other Cadileſquirie is for NATOLIA: They are ſoueraigne Iudges in all cauſes, and as it were Patriarks. They are of great authorie, and haue place in the Diuano with the Baſſaes to conſult of weightie matters.

There is a third degree of their church men, belonging to their law, called Mulli, which are biſhops & chiefe gouernors vnder the Mufti; and their office is to place and diſplace churchmen at their diſcretion. Next are the Nuderiſi, who are ſuffragans to the biſhops, and their charge is to ſee the Cadies do their duties. Next come the Cadis who are Iudges to puniſh
B offendors, of which there is one in euery citie vnder the Seigniors commaund. The Mulli, Muderiſi, and Cadi.

Vnder theſe are another kind of young doctors of the law called Naipi, who are not ſo well read as to be abſolute Iudges, but yet ſupplie their places in their abſence. The Naipi.

After theſe are the Hogi, who write their bookes, for that they allow no printing: and inferior vnto them are the Calfi, who read vnto them that write. And the youngeſt of all are called Soſti, who are young ſtudents or nouices in their law. The Hogi, Calfi, and Soſti.

Theſe are their ſeuerall degrees of lawyers or churchmen: for the Turks are gouerned by a kind of Eccleſiaſticall law, according to their Alcaron. They haue colledges (called Medreſſæ) at CONSTANTINOPLE, & in other places, where they liue and ſtudie their law and diuinitie, and ſo they aſcend by degrees to the higheſt dignitie of their profeſſion.

C As for their religion, it began in the time of the emperor Heraclius, when as the empire was much diſmembred by the heriſies of Arius and Neſtorius: Mahomet borne in ARABIA imbraced this opportunitie, ſeeking to ouerthrow the diuinitie of Ieſus Chriſt, which was oppoſed by the Iewes and Arabians: He was aſſiſted by two hereticks, the one was Iohn a Neſtorian, and the other Sergius an Arian. After which (being aſſiſted by many ſlaues, to whom he allowed all that was pleaſing to the ſence and fleſh if they ſhould receiue this law) he obtained many victories. By Mahomets law they make a diſtinction of cleane & vnclean meats to content the Iews, and alſo it maintaines circumciſion, but not at the eight day of their birth, as the Iewes vſe it, but after the eight yeare, when the infant is able to make confeſſion of his faith, where lifting vp his finger he ſpeakes theſe words, which are grauen in their temples in the The Turkes religion.
D Arabian tongue: There is but one God whoſe prophet Mahomet is, one God and equall prophets. The circumciſion being ended, they feaſt three daies together, and then they carrie the circumciſed to a bath with great pompe; after which the gueſts conduct him to his houſe, and preſent him with gifts. The women are not circumciſed, but onely ſpeake the words. If any Chriſtian abiure his faith & indure circumciſion (as they often do by reaſon of their tributes and vexations) they are led through the towne with great honor and reioicing of the people, who do alſo giue vnto them, and they pay no tributes. Mahomets law denies the diuinitie of Ieſus Chriſt, to pleaſe the Arians who were then powerfull: It is full of fables to pleaſe Idolaters, and it giues libertie to the fleſh, which is pleaſing to moſt men.

They confeſſe one God, and honor Ieſus Chriſt, not as the ſonne of God, but as a prophet
E borne of the virgin Marie. They neither honour nor allow images. Friday is their Sabbath as Sunday is ours. They obſerue a Lent of 30 daies, which they call Ramadan, during which they eat nothing in the day time, but when night comes all meats are indifferent, but ſwines fleſh; yet they abſtaine from wine and women. They haue their Eaſter, called Bayran, which continues three daies, in which they enioy all pleaſures: But this feaſt is not alwaies prefixed, for that they account not the day according to the courſe of the Sunne, but of the Moone; and therefore they do carefullv obſerue the new Moone, and ſalute it.

They haue no bels in their Moſques, neither do they ſuffer the Chriſtians which liue there to haue any. They put off their ſhooes when they go into their Moſques, & take them againe at their comming forth. Whereſoeuer they ſit in their churches or houſes, they haue tapeſtrie
F couerlets or mats vnder them: they are not much giuen to contemplation or learning, yet the Turkiſh women being married and hauing iſſue, are carefull to breed vp their children, and to be inſtructed; for the which there are many ſchooles, where they read their laws, to the end they may ſerue in their Moſques, and be able to gouerne the common weale.

The Turks by Mahomets law haue leaue to marrie as many wiues as they can maintaine; and a Turkiſh woman being once with child, her husband neuer toucheth her vntill ſhe be deliue-

deliuered, but lies with his slaues out of the house where his wife remaines. They haue a certaine kind of marriage made at pleasure, which they call Kebin, the which is many times practised by strangers, who being out of their countrie contract with women, whom they are to enioy during their pleasure, and when they cast them off, they giue them a certaine summe of money, and keepe the children. The Cadis or Iudges allow not this kind of contract, especially among Christians, vnlesse it be with an oath of marriage. A Turke hauing had the vse of a Christian woman, they are both condemned to die, vnlesse she will abiure her faith: the like is obserued betwixt a Christian and a Turkish woman, if they haue bin found together. Diuorce is allowed among them in case of barrennesse and incontinencie. G

There are foure orders of religious men among the Turks which differ in their liuing, habite, and ceremonies. These bee the Terlaques, Deruis, Kalenders, and Huquiemales, and these last are very vicious, and wicked impostors, deceiuing of the common people. The Deruis is a strict order liuing in contemplation, much like vnto the Capuchins among the Romish Papists. The Turks forbeare to blaspeme either God, Christ, or Mahomet, or any other Saint whatsoeuer, and they punish blasphemie seuerely. They conuerse with Christians, and eat and trafficke with them freely; yea sometimes they marie their daughters, and suffer them to liue after their owne religion. But they hate the Iews, and despise them as the basest people n the world. They haue an assured confidence, that he that shall duely obserue the lawes of Mahomet, shall haue eternall life, and a Paradise full of delights: And contrariwise they that shall breake the lawes of their Alcaron are threatned with hell and eternall death; yet they haue an opinion that he that beleeues in the Alcaron when he dies, shall bee vndoubtedly saued. H I

The disposition of the Turkes.

To conclude this relation with some few lines of their humours and dispositions; they write of them that they are grosse witted, idle, and vnfit for labour. They are exceeding couetous and corrupt, aboue all other nations, for iustice is sold to him that offers most. They are humble among themselues, and obey their superiors with great silence. They are proud and insupportable to strangers, thinking none fit to be compared with them. They are giuen to gluttonie and drunkennesse, and will spend whole daies together in feasting, and will drinke wine with excesse if it be in priuat, for that it is forbidden by their law. They are vaineglorious, proud, and deceitfull, neuer keeping their words but when it may be to their profit. They are much inclined to venerie, and are for the most part all Sodomites. They are very superstitious, giuing credit to dreames and diuinations; and they hold that euery mans destinie is written in his forehead, which cannot be altered or auoided. K

Thus I haue continued this historie for eleuen yeares, hauing informed my selfe out of the best authors and intelligencers I could find that concerne this subiect: I should haue beene glad that some which haue resided at CONSTANTINOPLE most part of this time, would haue assisted me with their obseruations which should haue been for the generall good of our nation; but I hope notwithstanding the reader shall find content and satisfaction.

A briefe diſcourſe of the greatneſſe of the Turkiſh Empire: as alſo wherein the greateſt ſtrength thereof conſiſteth, and of what power the bordering Princes, as well Mahometans as Chriſtians, are in compariſon of it.

By RICHARD KNOLLES.

THe Hiſtorie of the Turkes (being indeed nothing elſe but the true record of the wofull ruines of the greater part of the Chriſtian commonweale) thus as before paſſed through, and at length brought to an end; and their empire (of all others now vpon earth farre the greateſt) as a proud champion ſtill ſtanding vp as it were in defiance of the whole world: I thought it good for the concluſion of this my labour, to propoſe vnto the view of the zealous Chriſtian, the greatneſſe thereof; and ſo neere as I could to ſet down the bounds and limits within the which it is (by the goodnes of God) as yet contained, together with the ſtrength and power thereof, as alſo in what regard it hath the neighbor princes bordering or confining vpon it, with ſome other particularities tending vnto the ſame purpoſe. All or moſt part whereof, although it be by the conſiderat well to be gathered out of the whole courſe of the Hiſtorie before going, yet ſhall it more plainly here together in the full thereof appeare, than by the long and particular conſideration of the riſing and encreaſe thereof be perceiued: not much vnlike the ouergrowne tree, at the greatneſſe whereof euery man wondereth, no man in the mean time either perceiuing or marking how by little and little in tract of time it grew vp to that bigneſſe, as now to ouertop all the reſt of the wood. The imperiall ſeat of this ſo great and dreadfull an empire, is the moſt famous citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, ſometime the glorie of the Greeke empire, but now the place where Achmat the firſt of that name, and foureteenth of the Othoman emperours, acknowledging no man like vnto himſelfe, triumpheth ouer many nations: a city fatally founded to commaund, and by the great conqueror Tamerlan of all others thought to be the beſt ſeated for the empire of the world. In which citie (taken from the Chriſtians by Mahomet the ſecond, by the Turkes ſurnamed the Great, and the Greeke empire by him ſubuerted) as the Othoman emperours haue euer ſince ſeated themſelues, ſo haue they wonderfully euen to the aſtoniſhment of the world, out of the ruines of that ſo glorious a State encreaſed both their ſtrength and empire, almoſt altogether fixed euen in the ſelfeſame kingdomes, countries, and regions, as was ſometimes that; though not as yet (God be thanked) able to attaine to the vttermoſt bounds that that empire ſometimes had, eſpecially in EVROPE; albeit that it haue oftentimes in pride thereof moſt mightily ſwolne, and in ſome few places thereof ſomewhat alſo exceeded the ſame. Amongſt the reſt of the Othoman emperours, this great Monarch of whom we ſpeak (namely Achmat the firſt, which now raigneth in that moſt ſtately and imperiall citie) hath at this preſent vnder his commaund and empire, the chiefe and moſt fruitfull parts of the three firſt knowne parts of the world: only AMERICA remaining free from him, not more happie with the rich mines thereof, than in that it is ſo farre from out of his reach. For in EVROPE hee hath all the ſea coaſt from the confines of EPIDAVRVS (the vttermoſt bound of his empire in EVROPE Weſtward) vnto the mouth of the riuer TANAIS, now called DON, with whatſoeuer lyeth betwixt BVDA in HVNGARIE, and the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE: in which ſpace is comprehended the better part of HVNGARIE, all BOSNA, SERVIA, BVLGARIA, with a great part of DALMATIA, EPIRVS, MACEDONIA, GRECIA, PELOPONESVS, THRACIA, the ARCHIPELAGO, with the rich iſlands contained therein. In AFRICA he

he poſſeſſeth all the ſea coaſt from VELEZ (or as ſome call it BELIS) DE GOMERA, or more truely to ſay, from the riuer MVLVIA (the bounder of the kingdome of FEZ) euen vnto the Arabian gulfe or red ſea Eaſtward, except ſome few places vpon the riuage of the ſea, holden by the king of SPAINE, viz. MERSALCABIR, MELILLA, ORAN, and PENNON: and from ALEXANDRIA Northward vnto the citie of ASNA, called of old SIENE, Southward: in which ſpace are contained the famous kingdomes of TREMIZEN, ALGIERS, TVNES, and EGYPT, with diuers other great cities and prouinces. In ASIA all is his from the ſtraits of HELLESPONTVS Weſtward, vnto the great citie of TAVRIS Eaſtward: & from DERBENT neere vnto the Caſpian ſea Northward, vnto ADENA vpon the gulfe of ARABIA Southward. The greatnes of this his empire may the better be conceiued by the greatneſſe of ſome parts thereof: the meere of MEOTIS, which is all at the Turkiſh emperours command, being in compaſſe a thouſand miles; and the Euxine or Blacke ſea in circuit two thouſand and ſeuen hundred; and the Mediterranean coaſt which is ſubiect vnto him, containing in compaſſe about eight thouſand miles. But to ſpeake of his whole territorie together, he goeth in his owne dominion from TAVRIS to BVDA, about three thouſand two hundred miles. The like diſtance is from DERBENT vnto ADENA. From BALSERA vpon the Perſian gulfe vnto TREMISENA in BARBARIE, are accounted little leſſe than 4000 miles. He hath alſo in the ſea, the moſt noble iſlands of CYPRVS, EVBŒA, RHODVS, SAMOS, CHIOS, LESBOS, and others of the ARCHIPELAGO. In this ſo large and ſpacious an empire are contained many great and large countries, ſometime moſt famous kingdomes, abounding with all maner of worldly bleſſings and natures ſtore: For what kingdome or countrie is more fruitfull than EGYPT, SYRIA, and a great part of ASIA? What countrie more wealthie or more plentifull of all good things than was ſometime HVNGARIE, GRECIA, and THRACIA? In which countries he hath alſo many rich and famous cities, but eſpecially foure, which bee of greateſt wealth and trade: namely CONSTANTINOPLE, CAIRE, ALEPPO, and TAVRIS. CONSTANTINOPLE for multitude of people exceedeth all the cities of EVROPE; wherein are deemed to be aboue ſeuen hundred thouſand men: which if it be ſo, is almoſt equall to two ſuch cities as PARIS in FRANCE. ALEPPO is the greateſt citie of SYRIA, and as it were the centre whereunto all the merchandiſe of ASIA repaire. TAVRIS of late the royall ſeat of the Perſian kings, and one of the greateſt cities of that kingdome, from whom it was in this our age taken by Amurath the third, hath in it aboue two hundred thouſand men. CAIRE amongſt all the citie cities of AFRICA is the chiefe, leauing all others far behind it (although that ſome make the citie CANO equall vnto it in greatneſſe) being as it were the ſtorehouſe not of EGYPT only, and of a great part of AFRICA, but of INDEA alſo; the riches whereof being brought by the red ſea to SVES, and from thence vpon cammels to CAIRE, and ſo downe the riuer Nilus to ALEXANDRIA, are thence diſperſed into all theſe Weſterne parts: albeit that this rich trade hath of late time been much impaired, and ſo like more to be, the Chriſtians (eſpecially the Portugals) trafficking into the Eaſt Indies, and by the vaſt Ocean tranſporting the rich commodities of thoſe Eaſterne countries into the Weſt, to the great hinderance of the grand ſeignior his cuſtomes in CAIRE.

The greatneſſe of the Turkes empire.

The foure chiefe cities for trade in the Turkes empire.

The Othoman gouernment in this his ſo great an empire, is altogether like the gouernment of the maſter ouer his ſlaue, and indeed meere tyranicall: for the great Sultan is ſo abſolute a lord of all things within the compaſſe of his empire, that all his ſubiects & people, be they neuer ſo great, do call themſelues his ſlaues, & not his ſubiects: neither hath any man power ouer himſelfe, much leſſe is he lord of the houſe wherein he dwelleth, or of the land which he tilleth, except ſome few families in CONSTANTINOPLE, vnto whom ſome few ſuch things were by way of reward and vpon ſpeciall fauour giuen by Mahomet the ſecond, at ſuch time as he woon the ſame. Neither is any man in that empire ſo great or yet ſo far in fauor with the great Sultan, as that he can aſſure himſelfe of his life, much leſſe of his preſent fortune or ſtate longer than it pleaſeth the Sultan. In which ſo abſolut a ſoueraignty (by any free borne people not to be endured) the tyrant preſerueth himſelfe by two moſt eſpecial meanes: firſt, by taking of all armes from his naturall ſubiects; and then by putting the ſame & all things elſe concerning the ſtate and the gouernment therof into the hands of the Apoſtata or renegate Chriſtians, whō for moſt part euery third, fourth, or fift yere (or oftner if his need ſo require) he

The meanes whereby the Turkiſh emperours preſerue themſelues in ſo abſolute a ſoueraignte.

A he taketh in their childhood from their miſerable parents, as his tenths or tribute children. Whereby he gaineth two great commodities: firſt, for that in ſo doing he ſpoyleth the prouinces he moſt feareth, of the flower, ſinewes, and ſtrength of the people, choice being ſtill made of the ſtrongeſt youthes, and fitteſt for warre: then, for that with theſe as with his own creatures he armeth himſelfe, and by them aſſureth his ſtate: for they in their childhood taken from their parents laps, and deliuered in charge to one or other appointed to that purpoſe, quickly & before they be aware become Mahometans; and ſo no more acknowledging father or mother, depend wholly of the great Sultan, who to make vſe of them, both feeds them and foſters them, at whoſe hands only they looke for all things, and whom alone they
B thanke for all. Of which frie ſo taken from their Chriſtian parents (the onely ſeminarie of his warres) ſome become horſemen, ſome footmen, and ſo in time the greateſt commaunders of his ſtate and empire next vnto himſelfe, the naturall Turkes in the meane time giuing themſelues wholly vnto the trade of merchandiſe and other their mechanicall occupations: or elſe to the feeding of cattell, their moſt auncient and naturall vocation, nut intermedling at all with matters of gouernment or ſtate. So that if vnto theſe his ſouldiors, all of the Chriſtian race, you ioine alſo his fleet and money, you haue as it were the whole ſtrength of his empire: for in theſe foure, his horſemen, footmen, his fleet, and money, eſpecially conſiſteth his great force and power: whereof to ſpeake more particularly, & firſt concerning his money, it is commonly thought, that his ordinarie reuenew exceedeth not eight millions of
C gold. And albeit that it might ſeeme, that he might of ſo large an empire receiue a far greater reuenew, yet doth he not, for that both he and his men of warre (in whoſe power all things are) haue their greateſt and almoſt only care vpon armes, fitter by nature to waſt and deſtroy countries, than to preſerue and enrich them: inſomuch, that for the preſeruation of their armies, and furtherance of their expeditions (euerie yeare to doe) they moſt grieuouſly ſpoile euen their owne people and prouinces whereby they paſſe, ſcarce leauing them neceſſaries wherewith to liue; ſo that the ſubiects deſpairing to enioy the fruits of the earth, much leſſe the riches which by their induſtrie and labour they might get vnto themſelues, doe now no further endeauor themſelues either to husbandrie or trafficke than they needs muſt, yea than verie neceſſitie it ſelfe enforceth them: For to what end auaileth it to ſow that another man
D muſt reape? or to reap that which another man is readie to deuour? Whereupon it commeth that in the territories of the Othoman empire, yea euen in the moſt fruitfull countries of MACEDONIA and GRECE are ſeene great foreſts, all euery where waſt, few cities well peopled, and the greateſt part of thoſe countries lying deſolate and deſart: ſo that husbandrie (in all well ordered commonweales the princes greateſt ſtore) decaying, the earth neither yeelderh her encreaſe vnto the painefull husbandman, neither he matter vnto the artificer, neither the artificer wares to furniſh the merchant with, all together with the plough running into ruine and decay. As for the trade of merchandiſe, it is almoſt all in the hands of the Iewes, or the Chriſtians of EVROPE, viz. the Raguſians, Venetians, Genowaies, French, or Engliſh; the naturall Turks hauing therein the leaſt to doe, holding in that their ſo large an empire no other
E famous cities for trade, more than the foure aboue named, viz. CONSTANTINOPLE, TAVRIS, ALEPPO, and CAIRE: whereunto may be added CAFFA and THESSALONICA in EVROPE, DAMASCVS, TRIPOLIS, and ADEN, in ASIA: ALEXANDRIA and ALGIERS in AFRICKE. In our countries here in this Weſt part of EVROPE, of the aboundance of people oftentimes ariſeth dearth; but in many parts of the Turks dominions, for want of men to manure the ground: moſt part of the poore countrie people drawne from their owne dwellings, being enforced with victuals and other neceſſaries to follow their great armies in their long expeditions, of whom ſcarcely one of ten euer return home to their dwellings againe, there by the way periſhing, if not by the enemies ſword, yet by the wants, the intemperatnes of the aire, or immoderat pains taking. But to come neerer vnto our purpoſe, although the great Turks ordinary
F reuenews be no greater than is aforeſaid, yet are his extraordinary eſcheats to be greatly accounted of, eſpecially his confiſcations, forfeitures, fines, amerciaments (which are right many) his tributes, cuſtomes, tithes & tenths of all preyes taken by ſea or land, with diuers other ſuch like, far exceeding his ſtanding and certain reuenew: his Baſſaes and other his great officers, like rauening Harpies as it were ſucking out the bloud of his poore ſubiects, and heaping

vp ineſtimable treaſures, which for the moſt part fall againe into the grand Seignior his coffers. Ibrahim the Viſier Baſſa (who liued not long ſince) is ſuppoſed to haue brought with him from CAIRE to the value of ſix millions: & Mahomet another of the Viſiers was thought to haue had a far greater ſumme. His preſents alſo amount vnto a great matter: for no embaſſador can come before him without gifts, no man is to hope for any commodious office or preferment without mony, no man may with emptie hands come to the preſence of him ſo great a prince, either from the prouince he had the charge of, or from any great expedition he was ſent vpon; neither vnto ſo great and mightie a prince are trifles preſented. The Vaynods of MOLDAVIA, VALACHIA, and TRANSYLVANIA (before their late reuolt) by gifts preſerued themſelues in their principalities, being almoſt dayly changed, eſpecially in VALACHIA and MOLDAVIA: for thoſe honours were by the graund ſeigniour ſtill giuen to them that would giue moſt; who to performe what they had offered, miſerably oppreſſed the people, and brought their prouinces into great pouertie. In briefe, an eaſie thing it is for the great tyrant to find occaſion for him at his pleaſure to take away any mans life, together with his wealth, be it neuer ſo great: ſo that he cannot well be ſaid to lacke money, ſo long as any of his ſubiects hath it. Neuertheleſſe, the late Perſian war ſo emptied the moſt couetous Sultan Amurath his coffers, and exhauſted his treaſures; that all ouer his empire the value of his gold was beyond all credit enhanced, inſomuch, that a Chiquine was twice ſo much worth as before: beſide that, the mettall whereof his gold and ſiluer was made, was ſo embaſed, that it gaue occaſion vnto the Ianizaries to ſet fire vpon the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE; to the great terrour not of the vulgar ſort only, but of the grand Seignior himſelfe alſo. And in the citie of ALEPPO only were in the name of the great Sultan 60000 Chequines taken vp in preſt of the merchants there, which how well they were repaied, we leaue for them to report.

Now albeit that the Turks reuenewes be not ſo great as the largenes of his empire and the fruitfulneſſe of his countries might ſeeme to affoord, all the ſoile being his owne; yet hath he in his dominion a commoditie of greater value and vſe than are the reuenewes themſelues; which is the multitude of the Timariots, or penſioners, which are all horſemen, ſo called of Timaro, that is a ſtipend which they haue of the great Sultan, viz. the poſſeſſion of certain villages and towns, which they hold during their life, and for which they ſtand bound for euery threeſcore duckats they haue of yearely reuenew to maintaine one horſman, either with bow and arrowes, or els with targuet and launce; and that as well in time of peace as warre: for the Othoman emperours take vnto themſelues all ſuch lands as they by the ſword win from their enemies, as well Mahometanes as Chriſtians, all which they diuide into Timars, or as we may call them Commendams, which they giue vnto their ſouldiours of good deſert for terme of life, vpon condition, that they ſhall (as is aforeſaid) according to the proportion thereof keepe certaine men and horſes fit for ſeruice alwaies readie whenſoeuer they ſhall be called vpon. Wherein conſiſteth the greateſt policie of the Turkes, and the ſureſt meane for the preſeruation of their empire. For if by this meanes the care of manuring the ground were not committed vnto the ſouldiors, for the profit they hope thereof, but left in the hand of the plaine painfull husbandman, all would in that ſo warlike an empire lie waſt and deſolat; the Turks themſelues commonly ſaying, That whereſoeuer the grand ſeigniour his horſe ſetteth his foot, the graſſe will there no more grow: meaning, the deſtruction that their great armies bring in all places where they come. The inſtitution of theſe Timariots, and the taking vp of the Azamoglans (for ſo they call thoſe children which are taken vp from their Chriſtian parents to be brought vp for Ianizaries) are the two chiefe pillars of the Turks empire, and the ſtrength of their wars: both which ſeeme to be deuiſed vnto the imitation of the Romanes, as are diuers things moe in the Turkiſh gouernment; for the Romane emperors vſed their owne ſubiects in their wars, and of them conſiſted the Prætorian armie, which neuer departed from the emperours ſide, but were ſtill to guard his perſon, as do the Ianizaries the great Turke. And in the Romane empire lands were giuen vnto ſoldiors of good deſert for them to take the profit of during their liues, in reward of their good ſeruice and valour, which were called Beneficia, and they which had them, Beneficiarij, or as we tearme them, Benefices, and Beneficed men. Alexander Seuerus graunted vnto ſuch ſouldiours heires that they might enioy thoſe lands and commendams, vpon condition alſo, that they themſelues ſhould

A ſerue as had their fathers, otherwiſe not. Conſtantine alſo the Great gaue vnto his captaines that had well deſerued of him, certaine lands for them to liue vpon during the terme of their life. The like fees in FRANCE, which the called Feuda, were of temporaries made perpetuities by theſe their late kings. Theſe Timariot horſemen in the Turkiſh empire, ſerue to two great and moſt notable purpoſes: whereof the firſt is, that by them the Grand Seignior, as with a bridle, keepeth the reſt of his ſubiects in euery part of his great empire in awe, ſo that they cannot ſo ſoone moue, but that they ſhall haue theſe his Timariots as faulcons in their necks; for to that purpoſe they are diſperſed all ouer his dominions and empire: The other vſe of them (and no leſſe profitable than the former) is, for that out of them he is alwaies able

B at his pleaſure to draw into the field an hundred and fiftie thouſand horſmen well furniſhed, readie to go whither ſoeuer he ſhall command them; with all whom he is not at one farthing charge. Which ſo great a power of horſmen cannot be continually maintained for leſſe than 14 millions of duckats yearely. Wherefore it is to be maruelled, that ſome comparing the Turks reuenewes with the Chriſtians, make no mention of this ſo great a part of the Othoman emperors wealth and ſtrength, ſeruing him firſt for the ſuppreſſing of all ſuch tumults as might ariſe in his empire, and then as a moſt principal ſtrength of his continual wars, alwaies readie to ſerue him in his greateſt expeditions. The number of theſe Timariot horſemen is now growne verie great, taking increaſe together with the Turks empire. It is reported, that Amurath the third, grandfather to Achmat that now raigneth, in his late warres againſt the

C Perſian, ſubdued vnto himſelfe ſo much territorie, as ſerued him to erect therein fortie thouſand Timariots: and appointed at TAVRIS a new receit, which was yerely worth vnto him a million of gold. Theſe Timariots are in all accounted to be ſeuen hundred & nineteen thouſand fighting men: of whom 257000 haue their aboad and dwelling in EVROPE; & 462000 in ASIA and AFRICKE. Beſide theſe Timariots, the grand ſeignior had a great number of other horſmen alſo, vnto whom he giueth pay, which are his Spahi, Vlufagi, and Carapici of his Court, being indeed the nurſeries and ſeminaries of the great officers and gouernours of his empire: for from among them are ordinarily choſen the Sanzackes, which afterwards through their good deſerts, or the Sultans great fauour, become Viſiers, Beglerbegs, and Baſſaes, the chiefe rulers of that ſo mightie a monarchie. He hath alſo ſtill in his armies a great

D multitude of other horſemen called Acanzij, being indeed but rurall clownes, yet for certain priuiledges which they haue are bound to go vnto the wars, being euen of the Turks themſelues accounted of ſmall worth or value in compariſon of the Timariots. Hee receiueth great aid alſo from the Tartars in his wars, as alſo from the Valachians and Moldauians (vntill that now of late by the example of the Tranſylua ians, they haue, to the great benefit of the reſt of the Chriſtian commonweale, reuolted from him:) all which are to be accounted as the Romanes Auxiliarij, that is to ſay, ſuch as come to aid and aſſiſt him. And thus much for his horeſemen.

Another great part of his ſtrength conſiſteth in his footmen, and eſpecially in his Ianizaries: in whom two things are to be conſidered, their Nation, and Dexteritie in armes. Con-

E cerning their Nation, ſuch of the Azamoglans as are borne in ASIA, are not ordinarily enrolled in the number of the Ianizaries, but ſuch as are borne in EVROPE: for they of ASIA are accounted more effeminate, as they haue been alwaies, more readie to flie than to fight: whereas the people of EVROPE haue euen in the Eaſt been accounted for better and more valiant ſouldiours, hauing there, to their immortall glorie, ſet vp the notable trophies of their moſt glorious victories. The ſouldiors of ASIA be called Turkes, after the name of their nation, and not of their countrie (no countrie being indeed ſo properly called) and they of EVROPE Rumi, that is to ſay, Romani, or Romans, as the countrie, eſpecially about CONSTANTINOPLE, is called by the name of RVM-ILI, that is, the Romane countrie, as it was in auncient time, of the notable Roman Colonies therein, knowne by the name of ROMANIA. Now as concer-

F ning their dexteritie, ſuch male children are culled out from the Chriſtians, as in whom appeareth the greateſt ſignes of ſtrength, actiuitie, and courage: for theſe three qualities are in a ſouldior eſpecially required. This choice is made euery third yeare, except neceſſitie enforce it to be made ſooner, as it happened in the late Perſian warre: wherin not only oftner choice was made, but they were glad to vſe the Azamoglans alſo, a thing neuer before by them done. For thoſe youthes, the children of Chriſtian parents, being by them that haue taken them vp vp brought to CONSTANTINOPLE, are taken view of by the Aga of the Ianizaries, who cauſeth to be regiſtred the name of the youth, with the name of his father and countrie wherein he was borne: which done, part of them are ſent into the leſſer ASIA (now called NATOLIA) and other prouinces, where learning the Turkiſh language & law, they are alſo infected with the vices and manners of them with whom they liue, and ſo in ſhort time become right Mahometanes. Another part of them, and thoſe of the moſt towardlieſt, is diuided into cloiſters which the grand ſeignior hath at CONSTANTINOPLE and PERA, of whom the faireſt and moſt handſome are appointed for the Seraglio of the great Sultan himſelfe. All the time that theſe youths thus ſent abroad, liue in the leſſer ASIA, or other the Turkes prouinces, they are not appointed to any certaine exerciſes, but ſtill kept buſied ſome at husbandrie, ſome in gardening, ſome in building, ſome in other domeſticall ſeruices, neuer ſuffered to be idle, but alwaies occupied in painefull labour; where after certaine yeares they haue been thus enured to labour and paines taking, they are called thence into the cloiſters of the Azamoglans (for ſo they are called all the time vntill they be inrolled into the number of the Ianizaries) & are there deliuered vnto certaine ſpeciall gouernours appointed to take charge of them: who keepe them ſtill exerciſed in painefull worke and labour, entreating them euill ynough, as well in their diet, as in their apparell and lodging: they ſleepe together in large roomes, like vnto the religious Dormitories, wherein are lampes ſtill burning, and tutors attending, without whoſe leaue they may not ſtirre out of their places. There they learne to ſhoot both in the Bow and Piece, the vſe of the Scimitar, with many feats of actiuitie: and being well trained in thoſe exerciſes, are enrolled amongſt the Ianizaries or Spahi: of whom the Ianizaries receiue not leſſe than fiue aſpers, nor more than eight for their daily pay; and the Spahi ten. Being recorded among the Ianizaries, they are either ſent away into the warres, or into ſome garriſon, or elſe attend at the Court. Theſe laſt haue for their dwelling three great places like vnto three monaſteries in the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE: there they liue vnder their gouernours, to whom they are deputed, the younger with great obedience and ſilence ſeruing the elder in buying of things for them, in dreſſing of their meat, and ſuch like ſeruices. They that be of one ſeat or calling, liue together at one table, and ſleepe in long walkes. If any of them vpon occaſion chance to lie all night abroad without leaue, the next euening he is notably beaten, with ſuch nurture and diſcipline, that after his beating he like an Ape kiſſeth his Gouernours hands that ſo corrected him. Theſe Ianizaries haue many large priuiledges, are honoured, although they be moſt inſolent, and are feared of all men, yea euen of the great Sultan himſelfe, who is ſtill glad to make faire weather with them. In their expeditions or trauell they rob the poore Chriſtians cottages and houſes, who muſt not ſay one word to the contrarie. When they buy any thing, they giue for it but what they liſt themſelues. They can be iudged by none but by their Aga: neither can they be executed without danger of an inſurrection, and therfore ſuch execution is ſeldome done, and that very ſecretly. They haue a thouſand roialties: ſome of them are appointed to the keeping of embaſſadors ſent from forrein princes: otherſome of them are aſſigned to accompanie ſtrangers, trauellers, eſpecially them that be men of the better ſort, to the intent they may ſafely paſſe in the Turkes dominions; for which ſeruice they are commonly well rewarded. They haue made choice of their prince, namely of Selymus the firſt, his father Baiazet yet liuing; neither can any the Turkes Sultans account themſelues fully inueſted in their imperial dignitie, or aſſured of their eſtate, vntill they bee by them approoued and proclaimed. Euerie one of their Sultans at his firſt comming to the empire, doth giue them ſome great largeſſe; and ſometime the better to pleaſe them, encreaſeth alſo their pay. In euerie great expedition ſome of them goeth forth with their Aga, or his lieutenant, and are the laſt of all that fight. There is no office among the Turkes, that moe enuie at, than at the office of the Aga of the Ianizaries, for the greatneſſe of his authoritie and commaund: onely he and the Beglerbeg of GRECIA chuſe not their owne lieutenant, but haue them nominated vnto them by the Grand Seigniour. Vnto this great man the Aga of the Ianizaries, nothing can portend a more certaine deſtruction, than to be of them beloued, for then is he of the great Sultan ſtraightway feared or miſtruſted, and ſo occaſion ſought for to take him out of the way. The number of the Ianizaries of the Court is betwixt tenne and foureteene thouſand. This warlike order of ſouldiours is in theſe our daies much embaſed: for now natural Turks are taken in for Ianizaries, as are alſo

A ſo the people of Asia; whereas in former times none were admitted into that order, but the Chriſtians of Evrope only: beſide that, they marrie wiues alſo contrarie to their antient cuſtome, which is not now forbidden them. And becauſe of their long lying ſtill at Constantinople (a citie abounding with all manner of pleaſure) they are become much more effeminate and ſlothfull, but withall moſt inſolent, or more truely to ſay intollerable. It is commonly reported the ſtrength of the Turkiſh empire to conſiſt in this order of the Ianizaries, which is not altogether ſo, for albeit that they be indeed the Turks beſt footmen and ſureſt guard of the great Sultans perſon, yet vndoubtedly the greateſt ſtrength of his ſtate and empire reſteth nothing ſo much in them, as in the great multitude of his horſmen, eſpecially his Timariots.

B Beſide theſe Ianizaries, the Turkiſh emperor hath a great number of baſe footmen, whom the Turks call Aſapi, better acquainted with the ſpade than with the ſword, ſeruing rather to the wearying of their enemies with their multitude, than the vanquiſhing of them with their valour: with whoſe dead bodies the Ianizaries vſe to fill vp the ditches of towns beſieged, or to ſerue them for ladders to clime ouer the enemies wals vpon. But as the Romans had both their old Legionarie, and other vntrained ſoldiors, which they called Tirones; of whom the firſt were the chiefe ſtrength of their wars, and the other but as it were an aid or ſupplie; euen ſo the Turke accounteth his Timariot horſemen the ſtrength of his armie, and the Acanzij (which is another ſort of baſe and common horſemen) but as an acceſſorie: and ſo amongſt his footmen he eſteemeth of his Ianizaries, as did the Romans of their Prætorian legions, but

C of his Aſapi as of ſhadowes. The Ianizaries are by none to be commaunded, more than by the great Sultan himſelfe, and their Aga: as for the Baſſaes, they much regard them not, but in their rage oftentimes foule entreat euen the greateſt of them. The Aſapi as they are but baſe and common ſouldiours, ſo haue they alſo their ordinarie captains and commaunders, men of no great place or marke.

The Turks Aſapi, in what ſmal regard they are had.

The whole ſtate of the great empire of the Turkes is commanded by the great Sultan, by the graue aduice and counſell of his Viſier Baſſaes, which were not wont to be in number aboue foure, ſo prouiding for the ſecrecie of his high deſignes or important reſolutions, hardly by a greater multitude to be concealed: howbeit that the Sultans of latter times haue had ſometimes moe, ſometimes fewer, as their pleaſure was. Theſe men are of all others in that

D empire the greateſt, & for their high places moſt honored: vnto them euen the greateſt princes that haue any thing to doe in the Turkes Court, ſue and ſend their honourable preſents. By their aduice the great Sultan taketh his warres in hand, neither without them concludeth he any peace. They giue audience vnto the Embaſſadors of forreine princes, and from them receiue their diſpatch. The greateſt honors and preferments (which are many in that ſo great and large an empire) are all by their means to be obtained: which maketh them of all others to be ſought vnto. Some one or other of them are ſtill Generals ouer the great armies of the Turkes, eſpecially in theſe their late warres, their three laſt emperours neuer themſelues going forth into the field (excepting once that Mahomet the third for the maintenance of his credit with his men of warre, came downe into Hvngaria, and there woon the citie of E Agria:) which leading of ſuch mightie armies is ſtill with great emulation and ambition of the Viſier Baſſaes amongſt themſelues ſought after, as well for the great profit thereby vnto them ariſing, as for the honor therof, which is of all other the greateſt. But leauing theſe great ones, the cheife counſellors for his ſtate; the whole bodie of his ſo large and mightie an empire (all in the hands of martiall men) is gouerned by other great Baſſaes, whom they by a moſt proud barbarous name cal Beglerbegs, that is to ſay Lords of Lords, euery one of them hauing vnder him certaine Begs or Sanzacks, who are lords and rulers alſo ouer ſome particular cities and countries, with the Timariots therein; yet all ſtill at the command & beck of their Beglerbeg. In antient time there was wont to be but two of theſe proud Beglerbegs in all the Turks empire: the one commanding ouer all the prouinces the Turke had in Evrope;

F and the other ouer all that he had in the leſſer Asia, now of the Turkes called Natolia. But the Turkiſh empire greatly augmented in Asia by Selymus the firſt, & alſo afterwards much enlarged both in Evrope and Asia by Selymus his ſon, the number of the Beglerbegs were by him increaſed, and in ſome ſort alſo changed: who although that they be all Beglerbegs, and that one of them (eſpecially in the time of peace) in the managing of his ſoldiors and affaires of his countrey, is not ſubiect to any other, but is only at the commaund of the great Turke, yet notwithſtanding in time of warre, where the Beglerbeg of ROMANIA is, all are obedient vnto him, as the chiefeſt of the reſt; inſomuch, that none of them but only he and the Baſſa of NATOLIA are called by the ſtately name of Beglerbegs, the others being then only called the Baſſaes of ſuch and ſuch places, as of BVDA, ALEPPO, and ſuch like, although indeed they are in nature Beglerbegs, and ſo written in their records. For the more manifeſting of which their gouernment, as alſo that they which come hereafter, may by comparing of that which is here written, with the ſtate that then ſhall be, ſee how much this great Empire in the meane time increaſeth or diminiſheth, I haue thought good here briefly to ſet downe all the ſaid Beglerbegs with their Sanzacks and Timariots, and as neer as I could (either by reading, or the credible relation of others well trauelled in thoſe countries) together, and as it were at one ſhew ſet forth the whole ſtrength and power of this ſo mighty an Empire, as alſo in what countries and prouinces the ſame is eſpecially placed.

The firſt and chiefeſt of all the Beglerbegs in the Turkiſh empire, is the Beglerbeg of ROMANIA or GRECIA, called of the Turkes RVM-ILI (or as we ſay, the Romane countrey) the principall reſidence of whole Beglerbegſhip, is at SOPHIA, a citie of BVLGARIA; ſo appointed for the commodious ſituation thereof, for the better commaund of the reſt of the prouinces of EVROPE: howbeit, that he for the moſt part or rather altogether abideth at the court, which the other Beglerbegs cannot doe, for that they are bound not to depart from the gouernment of their prouinces: in which charge they ordinarily continue but three yeres only, the great Sultan ſtill changing and altering them at his pleaſure. This Beglerbeg hath vnder his owne enſigne and commaund fortie thouſand Timariots alwaies readie at his call, vnder the conduct of theſe and twentie Sanzakes following, namely, the

But theſe late erected honours, namely, the Beglerbegſhips of TEFLIS, SIRVAN, TEMIR-CAPI, CARS, TSCHILDER, FASSA, and the reſt gained by Amurath from the Perſians and the Georgians, although they containe a great territorie, are not of themſelues any of them worthie of thoſe proud titles, or yet able to maintaine the ſame, SIRVAN, REIVAN, and TAVRIS onely excepted; but were by the great Baſſaes, Muſtapha, Sinan, Ferat, and Oſman, Amurath his lieutenants, for their own greater honor, and the encouraging of them which were to defend L thoſe their new conqueſts, erected, being indeed nothing either in power or ſtrength comparable with the other more auncient Beglerbegs either in EVROPE or ASIA. But hauing thus paſſed through the great kingdomes and prouinces by the Turkes holden in EVROPE and ASIA, with their proud honours therein, let vs go forward toward the South, to ſee what great kingdomes and territories they at this preſent hold in AFRICKE alſo.

The Beglerbegs or great Commaunders of the Turkes Empire in AFRICKE.

1 Miſsir, who ſtill making his abode at the great citie of Caire, hath vnder his commaund all the kingdome of Aegipt, with ſixteene Sanzackes, and an hundred thouſand Timariots. M

2 Ceſsir (in anciente time called Iulia Ceſarie) but now commonly Algiers, where the Beglerbeg ſtill reſiding, commandeth ouer all that kingdome, wherein are fortie thouſand Timariots.

3 Tunis,

A The Beglerbeg of 3 Tunis, where he ſtill remaining as a Viceroy, commaundeth all that great and large kingdome.
4 Tripolis, the ſeat of his Beglerbegſhip, by Sinan Baſſa taken from the Knights of Malta in the yeare 1551.

There are beſide theſe, two other kingdomes in AFRICKE enrolled in the Turks records as their owne, although they be not as yet by them brought into the forme of Beglerbegſhips: namely the kingdomes of FES and MAROCO, but are as yet holden by them as their tributaries and vaſſales.

But hauing thus as it were taken view of the greatneſſe and forces of this ſo mightie a Mo-
B narchs empire by land, & ſo in ſome ſort bounded it out, let vs conſider alſo his power by ſea With the great Ocean he much medleth not, more than a little in the gulfes of PERSIA and ARABIA: moſt of his territories lying vpon the Mediterranean and Euxine ſeas, or elſe more inwarly into the heart of ASIA, neere vnto no ſea. Now for theſe ſeas, no prince in the world hath greater or better means to ſet forth his fleets than hath he: for the ouergrown woods of EPIRVS and CILICIA, and more than they, thoſe of NICOMEDIA and TRAPEZONDE, are ſo great and thicke, and ſo full of tall trees fit for the building of ſhips and gallies of all ſorts, as is almoſt incredible. Neither wanteth he ſtore of ſhipwrights and other carpenters for the framing of that ſo great ſtore of timber, large pay drawing euen the Chriſtian skilfull carpenters and workmen into his Arſenals at CONSTANTINOPLE, SINOPE, CALLIPPOLIS, & others.

The great power of the Turke in the Mediterranean & Euxine ſeas.

C For proofe wherof it is worth the noting, that Selymus the ſecond in our freſh remembrance, the next yeare after that notable ouerthrow by him receiued at the ECHINADES (commonly called the battel of LEPANTO) rigged vp a fleet wherwith Vluzales his admirall was not afraid to face the whole power of the confederat Chriſtian princes at CERIGO. Neither hath the Turk euer wanted good ſtore of expert ſeamen, after the maner of thoſe ſeas: for beſide thoſe he hath in ſtore at CALLIPPOLIS and SINOPE, out of his gallies which he hath alwaies in readineſſe in LESBOS, CHIOS, RHODVS, CYPRVS, & ALEXANDRIA, and from the pyrats which he continually receiueth into the ports of TVNIS, BVGIA, TRIPOLIS, & ALGIERS, he can and doth from them when need is chuſe captains, mariners, and rowers ſufficient for the manning and ſtoring of his fleet. What he is able to doe in thoſe ſeas, was well ſeene in our time, by thoſe
D fleets which he had at MALTA, CYPRVS, the ECHINADES, and GVLETTA. He hath beſide of all neceſſary and warlike prouiſion abundant ſtore, & of great ordnance to furniſh himſelfe withall both by ſea & land an infinit quantitie. Out of HVNGARIE he hath caried away aboue 5000 great pieces, out of CYPRVS 500, and few leſſe from GVLETTA, not to ſpeake what he hath more got from the Chriſtians in diuers other places alſo. What ſtore he hath of ſhot and pouder, he ſhewed at MALTA, where he diſcharged aboue 60000 great ſhot; at FAMAGVSTA, where he beſtowed 118000; & at GVLETTA, where in the ſpace of 39 daies he by the fury of his great ordnance ouerthrew the fortifications which the Chriſtians had bin 40 yeres in building. So that to returne againe to our purpoſe, the great Turke ſo well prouided of men, money, ſhipping, & great ordnance, and hauing done ſo great matters at ſea as is before rehearſed, is not E in reaſon otherwiſe to be accounted of than as of a moſt mighty & puiſſant prince, as well by ſea as land: which to be ſo, the greatnes of his Denizi Beglerbeg or great Admirall (cõmonly called Capitan Baſſa, of whom we haue not yet ſpoken) well declareth. This great man hauing charge of all the Grand Seignior his ſtrength at ſea, is alwayes one of the Viſier Baſſaes, not bound ſtill to follow the court, as the other Viſier Baſſaes be, but alwaies or for moſt part reſiant at CONSTANTINOPLE or CALLIPPOLIS, ſo to be the neerer vnto his charge. He that now hath this honorable place, is called of the Turks Cigala Baſſa, diſcẽded of an honorable family of that name in GENVA: who commonly reſiding at CONSTANTINOPLE or CALLIPPOLIS, hath vnder him 14 Sanzacks, all of them great commaunders and men of great place, namely, the

The princes as well Mahometans as Chriſtians, vpon whom the great empire of the Turk confineth, and of what power they bee in compariſon of the Turke.

The greatneſſe, wealth, and ſtrength of this ſo mightie an Empire, as well by ſea as land, G thus in ſome ſort declared, let vs now ſee vpon what princes it alſo confineth, and of what power euery one of them is in compariſon of it, ſo great and ouergrown a State. The Turks toward the Eaſt border vpon the Perſians, according to a right line, drawne by imagination from TAVRIS to BALSARA: vpon the Portugals at the Perſian gulfe, and ſo there likewiſe toward the South: at the red ſea, vpon the great Æthiopian king Preianes, commonly called Preſter Iohn: towards the Weſt, in AFRICKE vpon the king of MAROCO: and in EVROPE vp-on the kingdom of NAPLES, with ſome part of the Venetian ſigniorie: towards the North vp-on the Polonians, and the territories of the houſe of AVSTRIA. Now to begin with the Per-

The Perſian too weake for the great Turke.

ſian, the great Turke no doubt is in field too ſtrong for him, as by proofe hath bin oftentimes H ſeene: For Mahomet the Great in plaine battell ouercame the valiant Vſun-caſſanes: Selymus the firſt, and after him Solyman his ſonne, put to flight the noble Hyſmael and Tamas, the two great and famous Perſian kings: and now of late in our time, Amurath the third by his lieutenants hath taken from the Perſians all MEDIA, with the greater ARMENIA, both ſometimes famous kingdomes, together with the regall citie of TAVRIS. That the Turke ſo preuaileth, is by reaſon of his footmen, which the Perſian wanteth, and of his great ordnance, wherof the Perſian hath neither ſtore nor vſe: and although the Perſian by valours of their horſmen hath ſometime in open field foiled the Turke, yet haue they ſtill loſt ſome part of their countrey, Solyman taking from them MESOPOTAMIA, and Amurath MEDIA and ARMENIA. Neither did the Perſians alone feele that harme, and looſe their owne, but vndid their confederats alſo; I Selymus the firſt ſpoiling the Mamalukes of EGYPT & SYRIA, and vtterly rooting them from off the face of the earth, and Amurath by his lieutenants hauing brought to a low ebbe the warlike Georgians, both of them the Perſian kings friends and confederats. Now is not the

The Portugals too ſtrong for the Turke in the Eaſt Indies.

Turke ſo much too ſtrong at land for the Perſian, but that he is as much too weake at ſea for the Portugals: in thoſe ſeas I mean where their forces haue more than once to the Turks coſt met together in the Eaſt Indies. The Portugals hauing in thoſe rich but remote countries many ſure harbours and ports, yea faire countries & territories abounding with victuals and all prouiſion neceſſary for ſhipping, with ſome alſo of thoſe great Eaſterne princes, their allies and confederats: whereas the Turke on the other ſide hath nothing in the Perſian gulfe ſtrong, beſide BALSARA; the ſea-coaſt of ARABIA, which might ſtand him in beſt ſtead, hauing no K more but foure townes, and thoſe but weake and of ſmall worth. So that there, as alſo in the red ſea, it is a matter of exceeding charge and difficultie for him to ſet out any great fleet into thoſe ſeas; for that thoſe countries are vtterly deſtitute of wood fit to make ſhips of. For which cauſe, thoſe few times that he prepared his fleets in the red ſea (to haue cut off the Portugals trade into the Eaſt Indies) being not able to performe the ſame in the Perſian gulfe, he was enforced to bring the timber for the building of his gallies out of the ports of BITHINIA and CILICIA (out of another world as it were) vp the Nile vnto CAIRE, and from thence vpon to be compared vnto the Turke, but far inferiour vnto him both for commanders and ſoul-diors, as alſo for weapons and munition: for that great prince hath a great kingdom without fortification, and a multitude of ſouldiors without armes: as appeared by the ouerthrow of

A the other for the neereneſſe of the king of SPAINE, enemy vnto them both. Now then there remaineth the reſt of the Chriſtian princes bordering vpon the Turke; and firſt the king of POLONIA. What theſe two princes can doe the one againſt the other, hath bin ſeene in ſome former expeditions, wherein the Polonian had ſtill the worſe. Yet it ſhould ſeeme, that of later time the Turke hath not bin greatly deſirous to mooue the Polonian too farre: For that being prouoked by diuers occaſions (namely, in the reigne of Henry the third, in the wars that Iohn the Vayuod of VALACHIA had with the Turks, many Polonian horſmen ſerued the ſaid Vayuod, though not indeed ſent from the king: and in the time of Sigiſmund the third, the Polonian Coſſackes haue with diuers incurſions not a little troubled them: beſide the late
B motions of Iohn Zamoſchie the great Chancelor and Generall of the Polonian forces, for the ſtaying of the Tartars by the Turke ſent for) he hath been content to comport the ſame, and not with his wonted pride ſought to be thereof reuenged, as he hath for farre leſſe vpon ſome other princes. And on the other ſide, the Polonians ſince the vnfortunat expedition of king Ladiſlaus, neuer tooke vpon them any warres againſt the Turks, neither gaue ſuch aid as they ſhould vnto the Valachians their confederats, but ſuffered to be taken from themſelues, whatſoeuer they had toward the Euxine or blacke ſea: a thing imputed rather vnto the want of courage in their kings, than in the Nobilitie of that kingdome. Sigiſmund the firſt being by Pope Leo the tenth inuited to the wars againſt the Turks, anſwered them in theſe few words:
C Set you the Chriſtian princes at vnitie amongſt themſelues, and I for my part will not be wanting. Sigiſmund the ſecond ſo abhorred the wars, that he not onely declined the Turks, but prouoked by the Muſcouites, neuer ſought to reuenge the ſame. King Stephen (by the commendation of Amurath choſen king of POLONIA) an indifferent eſteemer both of his enemies forces and his owne, thought it a moſt dangerous thing to ioyne battell with the Turke, and yet in priuat talke with his friends would oftentimes ſay, That with thirty thouſand foot ioyned vnto his Polonian horſemen, hee durſt well to vndertake an expedition againſt the Turke: which he was ſuppoſed oftentimes to haue thought vpon. The Emperour, with the reſt of the princes of the houſe of AVSTRIA, are by a longer tract of ground ioyned vnto this great Empire of the Turks, than any one other prince of the world, & beſtow in fortifications and the maintenance of their Garriſons (wherein they haue continually aboue twentie thou-
D ſand horſe and foot) the greateſt part of their reuenues euen in the time of peace, much more in theſe their long warres; and with the Germane forces ioyned vnto their owne, are more careful how to defend that they haue yet left, than how to recouer that they haue already loſt or to enlage their Empire. The Emperor Ferdinand with greater force than ſucceſſe vndertooke the vnfortunat expeditions of BADA and POSSEGA: which ſo euill fell out, not for that his forces were not ſufficient or ſtrong ynough; but for that they wanted agilitie and dexteritie. The truth is, thoſe his armies were ſtrong ynough, and ſufficiently furniſhed with all things neceſſarie, but conſiſted for the moſt part of Germans and Bohemians, ſlow and heauie people, vnfit to encounter with the Turkes, a more readie and nimble kind of ſouldiors.
The Venetians alſo confrontier the Turks by many hundred miles both by ſea and land, and E defend themſelues rather by peaceable policie than force of armes: notably fortifying their ſtrong holds vpon their frontiers, declining by all meanes the dangers and charges of war, by embaſſages and rich preſents; leauing nothing vnattempted (their libertie and ſtate preſerued) rather than to fall to wars. To ſay the truth of them, although they had both coyne and warlike prouiſion ſufficient, yet want they men and victuals anſwerable to ſo great a war againſt ſo puiſſant an enemie. There remaineth only the king of SPAINE, of all other the great princes either Chriſtians or Mahometans (bordering vpon him) the beſt able to deale with him; his yearely reuenewes ſo farre exceeding thoſe of the Turkes, as that they are alſo probably thought to counteruaile the greateſt part of his Timariots: and his great dominions in SPAINE, PORTVGALL, NAPLES, SICILIA, MILLAINE, SARDINIA, and the Low Countries
F (if they were with him at vnitie) able to affourd vnto him ſo great and powerfull a ſtrength both by ſea and land, as might make him dreadfull euen vnto the Great Turke when he ſwelleth in his greateſt pride: But conſidering how his forces are diſtracted for the maintenance of his warres at once in diuers places; as alſo for the neceſſarie defence and keeping of his ſo large and diſperſed territories, not all the beſt of themſelues affected to the Spaniſh gouernment,

The king of Polonia vnwilling to meddle with the Turke, or the Turke with him

The Emperour with the reſt of the princes of the houſe of Auſtria, together with the aid of the Germanes, haue much adoe to defend themſelues againſt the Turke.

The Venetians by policy rather than by force maintaine their ſtate againſt the Turke.

ment, he is not to be thought of himſelfe ſtrong enough againſt the vnited forces of the great Turke, whenſoeuer they ſhould chance to be imploied vpon him. So that by this we haue alreadie ſaid, is eaſily to be gathered how much the Turke is too ſtrong for any one the neighbour princes, either Mahometanes or Chriſtians, bordering vpon him, and therefore to be of them the more feared. Yet leaſt ſome miſtaking me, might thinke, What, is then the Turke inuincible? Farre be that thought from me, to thinke any enemie of Chriſt Ieſu (be his arme neuer ſo ſtrong) to be able to withſtand his power, either quite to deuour his little flocke, rage hee neuer ſo much about it. As for the Turke, the moſt daungerous and profeſſed enemie of the Chriſtian Commonweale, bee his ſtrength ſo great, yea and haply greater too than is before declared (the greatneſſe of his dominions and empire conſidered) yet is he not to bee thought therefore either inuincible, or his power indeed ſo great as it in ſhew ſeemeth for to be: his Timariot horſmen (his greateſt ſtrength) diſperſed ouer his whole empire, being neuer poſſibly the one halfe of them by him to be gathered into the bodie of one armie: neither if they ſo were, poſſible in ſuch a multitude long to be kept together, liuing vpon no pay of his, but vpon ſuch ſtore and prouiſion onely as they bring with them from their Timari, neuer ſufficient long to maintaine them. Beſides that, the policie of his ſtate hardly or neuer ſuffereth him to draw aboue a third part of his Timariots out of his countries where they dwell, for feare leſt the reſt of the people by them ſtill kept vnder, ſhould in their abſence take vp armes againſt him in defence of themſelues and their auncient libertie: whereafter the greateſt part of thoſe poore oppreſſed ſoules, as well Mahometanes as Chriſtians in euery prouince of his Empire awaiting but the opportunitie, moſt deſirouſly longeth: ſo that more than two parts of them being alwaies to be left at home, for the neceſſarie defence of the ſpacious borders of his ſo large an Empire, as alſo for the keeping in obedience of ſo many diſcontented nations; it is a great matter, if hee euen in his greateſt warres draw together of theſe kind of ſouldiours the full number of an hundred and fiftie thouſand ſtrong, making vp the reſt of his huge multitude with his Acanzij, liuing of no pay of his, but vpon the ſpoile of the enemie onely, the fift part whereof they pay vnto him alſo. All which put together, what manner of men they be, and of what valour, not onely the ſmall armies of the Chriſtians vnder the leading of their worthie chiefetaines Huniades, Scanderbeg, king Matthias, and others, haue to their immortal glory in former times made good proofe: but euen in this our age, and that as it were but the other day, the Tranſyluanian prince with diuers other valiant captaines and commanders yet liuing, haue done the like alſo; as well witneſſeth the late battell of AGRIA, wherein the Chriſtians, in number not halfe ſo many as the Turkes, by plaine valour draue the great Sultan Mahomet himſelfe (with Ibrahim Baſſa his lieutenant Generall) out of the field, and had of him had the moſt glorious victorie that euer was got againſt that enemie, had they not by too much careleſneſſe and vntimely deſire of ſpoyle, themſelues ſhamefully interrupted the ſame. But thus to let his horſmen paſſe, the chiefe ſtrength of his footmen are his Ianizaries, neuer in number exceeding twelue or foureteene thouſand, yea ſeldome times halfe ſo many, euen in his greateſt armies, except he himſelfe be there in perſon preſent in the middeſt of them: who beſide the ſmall number of them, in the time of theſe their late voluptuous and effeminate Emperors, corrupted with the pleaſures of CONSTANTINOPLE, and for want of their woonted diſcipline, haue together with their auncient obedience and patience, loſt alſo a great part of their former reputation and valour: all the reſt of his footmen filling vp the bodie of his populous armie, being his Aſapi, rather pioners than ſouldiours, men of ſmall worth, and ſo accounted of, both of the Turks and their enemies alſo. So that all things well conſidered, his beſt ſouldiours being the leaſt part of his greateſt armies, and they alſo farre vnlike their predeceſſors, the ſterne followers of the former Othoman kings and emperours, but men now giuen to pleaſure and delight: it is not otherwiſe to be thought, but that he bringeth into the field far mo. men than good ſouldiors, more brauerie than true valour, more ſhew than worth, his multitude being his chiefeſt ſtrength, his ſuppoſed greatneſſe the terror of his neighbour princes, and both together the very maieſtie of his empire. Which although it be indeed verie ſtrong (for the reaſons before alleadged) yet is it by many probably thought to be now vpon the declining hand, their late emperors in their owne perſons far degenerating from their warlike progenitours, their ſouldiours generally

Why the Turk is not to be thoght inuincible, neither his power ſo ſtrong, as it in ſhew ſeemeth to bee.

The ſignes of the declining of the Turks empire.

A giuing themſelues to vnwonted pleaſures, their auncient diſcipline of warre neglected, their ſuperſtition not with ſo much zeale as of old regarded, and rebellions in diuers parts of his Empire of late ſtrangely raiſed, and mightily ſupported: all the ſignes of a declining ſtate. Which were they not at all to be ſeene, as indeed they be verie pregnant, yet the greatneſſe of this Empire being ſuch, as that it laboureth with nothing more than the weightineſſe of it ſelfe, it muſt needs (after the manner of worldly things) of it ſelfe fall, and againe come to nought, no man knowing when or how ſo great a worke ſhall be brought to paſſe, but hee in whoſe deepe counſels all theſe great reuolutions of Empires and Kingdomes are from eternitie ſhut vp: who at his pleaſure ſhall in due time by ſuch meanes as he ſeeth beſt accoun-
B pliſh the ſame, to the vnſpeakeable comfort of his poore afflicted flocke, in one place or other ſtill in danger to be by this roaring Lyon deuoured. Which worke of ſo great wonder, he for his Sonne our Sauiour Chriſt his ſake, the glorie of his name, and comfort of many thouſand oppreſſed Chriſtians, fed with the bread of carefulneſſe amidſt the furnace of tribulation, in mercie haſten, that wee with them, and they with vs, all as members of one bodie, may continually ſing, Vnto him be all honour and praiſe world without end.
